

Bibliothèque de Carabas.

VOL. IX.

Five hundred and fifty copies of this Edition have been printed, five hundred of which are for sale.

[All rights reserved.]

A Philological Essay Concerning the Pygmies of the Ancients.

By Edward Tyson, M.D., F.K.S., A.D. 1699.

Now Edited, with an Antroduction Treating of Pigmy Races and Fairy Tales, by Bertram
C. A. Mindle, D.Sc., M.D., M.A., Trinity College, Dublin; Dean of the Medical Faculty and Professor of Anatomy,
Mason College,
Birmingham.

য় 3

.T9

681

FKL

LONDON. MDCCCXCIV. PUBLISHED BY DAVID NUTT IN THE STRAND.

INDIANA UNIVERSITY
LIBRARIES
BLOOMINGTON

то

MY DEAR MOTHER

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2009 with funding from Indiana University

PREFATORY NOTE

It is only necessary for me to state here, what I have mentioned in the Introduction, that my account of the habits of the Pigmy races of legend and myth makes no pretence of being in any sense a complete or exhaustive account of the literature of this subject. I have contented myself with bringing forward such tales as seemed of value for the purpose of establishing the points upon which I desire to lay emphasis.

I have elsewhere expressed my obligations to M. De Quatrefage's book on Pigmies, obligations which will be at once recognised by those familiar with that monograph. To his observations I have endeavoured to add such other published facts as I have been able to gather in relation to these peoples.

I have to thank Professors Sir William Turner, Haddon, Schlegel, Brinton, and Topinard for their kindness in supplying me with information in response to my inquiries on several points.

Finally, I have to acknowledge my indebtedness to Professor Alexander Macalister, President of the Anthropological Institute, and to Mr. E. Sidney Hartland, for their kindness in reading through, the former the first two sections, and the latter the last two sections of the Introduction, and for the valuable suggestions which both have made. These gentlemen have laid me under obligations which I can acknowledge, but cannot repay.

BERTRAM C. A. WINDLE.

MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM, 1894.

INTRODUCTION

T.

EDWARD TYSON, the author of the Essay with which this book is concerned, was, on the authority of Monk's Roll of the Royal College of Physicians, born, according to some accounts. at Bristol, according to others, at Clevedon, co. Somerset, but was descended from a family which had long settled in Cumberland. He was educated at Magdalene Hall, Oxford, as a member of which he proceeded Bachelor of Arts on the 8th of February 1670, and Master of Arts on the 4th of November 1673. degree of Doctor of Medicine he took at Cambridge in 1678 as a member of Corpus Christi College. Dr. Tyson was admitted a candidate of the College of Physicians on the 30th of September 1680, and a Fellow in April 1683.

He was Censor of the College in 1694, and held the appointments of Physician to the Hospitals of Bridewell and Bethlem, and of Anatomical Reader at Surgeons' Hall. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and contributed several papers to the "Philosophical Transactions." Besides a number of anatomical works, he published in 1699 "A Philosophical Essay concerning the Rhymes of the Ancients," and in the same year the work by which his name is still known, in which the Philological Essay which is here reprinted finds a place. Tyson died on the 1st of August 1708, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and is buried at St. Dionis Backchurch. He was the original of the Carus not very flatteringly described in Garth's "Dispensary."

The title-page of the work above alluded to runs as follows:—

Orang-Outang, sive Homo Sylvestris:

OR, THE

ANATOMY

OF A

PYGMIE

Compared with that of a

Monkey, an Ape, and a Man.

To which is added, A

PHILOLOGICAL ESSAY

Concerning the Pygmies, the Cynocephali, the Satyrs, and Sphinges of the ANCIENTS.

Wherein it will appear that they are all either APES or MONKEYS, and not MEN, as formerly pretended.

By EDWARD TYSON M.D.

Fellow of the Colledge of Physicians, and the Royal Society: Physician to the Hospital of Bethlem, and Reader of Anatomy at Chirurgeons-Hall.

LONDON:

Printed for Thomas Bennet at the Half-Moon in St. Paul's Church-yard; and Daniel Brown at the Black Swan and Bible without Temple-Bar and are to be had of Mr. Hunt at the Repository in Gresham-Colledge. M DC XCIX.

It bears the authority of the Royal Society:-

17° Die Maij, 1699.

Imprimatur Liber cui Titulus, Orang-Outang, sive Homo Sylvestris, &c. Authore Edvardo Tyson, M.D. R.S.S.

JOHN HOSKINS, V.P.R.S.

The Pygmy described in this work was, as a matter of fact, a chimpanzee, and its skeleton is at this present moment in the Natural History Museum at South Kensington. Tyson's grand-daughter married a Dr. Allardyce, who was a physician of good standing in Cheltenham. The "Pygmie" formed a somewhat remarkable item of her dowry. Her husband presented it to the Cheltenham Museum, where it was fortunately carefully preserved until, quite recently, it was transferred to its present position.

At the conclusion of the purely scientific part of the work the author added four Philological Essays, as will have appeared from his title-page. The first of these is both the longest and the most interesting, and has alone been selected for republication in this volume.

This is not the place to deal with the scientific merit of the main body of Tyson's work, but it may at least be said that it was the first attempt which had been made to deal with the anatomy of any of the anthropoid apes, and that its execution shows very conspicuous ability on the part of its author.

Tyson, however, was not satisfied with the honour of being the author of an important morphological work; he desired to round off his subject by considering its bearing upon the, to him, wild and fabulous tales concerning pigmy races. The various allusions to these races met with in the pages of the older writers, and dis cussed in his, were to him what fairy tales are to us. Like modern folk-lorists, he wished to explain, even to euhemerise them, and bring them into line with the science of his day. Hence the "Philological Essay" with which this book is concerned. There are no pigmy races, he says; "the most diligent enquiries of late into all the parts of the inhabited world could never discover any such puny diminutive race of mankind." But there are tales about them, "fables and wonderful and merry relations, that are transmitted down to us concerning them," which surely require explanation. That explanation he found in his theory that all the accounts of pigmy tribes were based upon the mistakes of travellers who had taken apes for men. Nor was he without followers in his opinion; amongst whom here need only be mentioned Buffon, who in his Histoire des Oiseaux explains the Homeric tale much as Tyson had done. The discoveries, however, of this century have, as all know, re-established in their essential details the accounts of the older writers, and in doing so have demolished the theories of Tyson and Buffon. We now know, not merely that there are pigmy races in existence, but that the area which they occupy is an extensive one, and in the remote past has without doubt been more extensive still. Moreover, certain of these races have been, at least tentatively, identified with the pigmy tribes of Pliny, Herodotus, Aristotle, and other writers. It will be well, before considering this question, and before entering into any consideration of the legends and myths which may possibly be associated with dwarf races, to sketch briefly their distribution throughout the continents of the globe. It is necessary to keep clearly in view the upper limit which can justly be assigned to dwarfishness, and with this object it may be advisable to commence with a statement as to the average heights reached by various representative peoples. According to Topinard, the races of the world may be classified, in respect to their stature, in the following manner:—

Tall 5 ft. 8 in. and upwards.

Above the average . . 5 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 8 in.

Below the average . . . 5 ft. 4 in. to 5 ft. 6 in.

Short Below 5 ft. 4 in.

Thus amongst ordinary peoples there is no very striking difference of height, so far as the average is concerned. It would, however, be a great mistake to suppose that all races reaching a lower average height than five feet four inches are, in any accurate sense of the word, to be looked upon as pigmies. We have to descend to a considerably lower figure before that appellation can becorrectly employed. The stature must fall considerably below five feet before we can speak of the race as one of dwarfs or pigmies. Anthropometrical authorities have not as yet agreed upon any upward limit for such a class, but for our present purposes it may be convenient to say that any race in which the average male stature does not exceed four feet nine inches-that is, the average height of a boy of about twelve years of age—may fairly be described as pigmy. It is most important to bear this matter of inches in mind in connection with points which will have to be considered in a later section.

Pigmy races still exist in considerable numbers in Asia and the adjacent islands, and as it was in that continent that, so far as our present knowledge goes, they had in former days their greatest extension, and, if De Quatrefages be correct, their place of origin, it will be well to deal first with the tribes of that quarter of the globe. "The Negrito" (i.e., pigmy black) "type," says the authority whom I have just quoted, and to whom I shall have to be still further indebted,* "was first placed in South Asia, which it without doubt occupied alone during an indeterminate period. It is thence that its diverse representatives have radiated, and, some going east, some west, have given rise to the black populations of Melanesia and Africa. In particular, India and Indo-China first belonged to the blacks. Invasions and infiltrations of different yellow or white races have split up these Negrito populations, which formerly occupied a continuous area, and mixing with them, have profoundly altered them. The present condition of things is the final result of strifes and mixtures, the most ancient of which may be referred back to prehistoric times." The invasions above mentioned having in the past driven many of the races from the mainland to the islands, and those which remained on the continent having undergone greater modification by crossing with taller and alien races, we may expect to find the purest Negritos amongst the tribes inhabiting the various archipelagoes situated south and east of the mainland. Amongst these, the Mincopies of the Andaman Islands offer a convenient starting-point. The knowledge which we possess of these little blacks is extensive, thanks to the labours in particular of Mr. Man * and Dr. Dobson,† which may be found in the Journal of the Anthropological Institute, and summarised in De Quatrefages' work. The average stature of the males of this race is four feet six inches, the height of a boy of ten years of age. Like children, the head is relatively large in comparison with the stature, since it is contained seven times therein, instead of seven and a half times, as is the rule amongst most average-sized peoples. Whilst speaking of the head, it may be well to mention that these Negritos, and in greater or less measure other Negritos and Negrillos (i.e., pigmy blacks, Asiatic or African), differ in this part of the body in a most important respect from the ordinary African negro. Like him, they are black, often intensely so: like him, too, they have woolly hair arranged in tufts, but, unlike him, they have round (brachycephalic) heads instead of long (dolichocephalic); and the purer the race, the more marked is this distinction. The Mincopie has a singularly short life; for though he attains puberty at much the same age as ourselves, the twenty-second year brings him to middle life, and the fiftieth, if reached, is a period of extreme senility. Pure in race, ancient in history, and carefully studied, this race deserves some further attention here than can be extended to others with which I have to deal. The moral side of the Mincopies seems to be highly developed; the modesty of the young girls is most strict; monogamy is the rule, and-since even the marriage of cousins-german is considered highly immoral. "Men and women," says Man, "are models of constancy." They believe in a Supreme Deity, respecting whom they say, that "although He resembles fire, He is invisible: that He was never born, and is immortal: that He created the world and all animate and inanimate objects, save only the powers of evil. During the day He knows everything, even the thoughts of the mind; He is angry when certain sins are committed, and full of pity for the unfortunate and miserable, whom He sometimes condescends to assist. He judges souls after death, and pronounces on each a sentence which sends them to paradise or condemns them to a kind of purgatory. The hope of escaping the torments of this latter place influences their conduct. Puluga, this Deity, inhabits a house of stone; when it rains, He descends upon the earth in search of food; during the dry weather He is asleep." Besides this Deity, they believe in numerous evil spirits, the chief of whom is the Demon of the Woods. These spirits have created themselves, and have existed ab immemorabili. The sun, which is a female, and the moon, her husband, are secondary deities. South of the Andaman Islands are the Nicobars, the aborigines of which, the Shom Pen,* now inhabit the mountains, where, like so many of their brethren, they have been driven by the Malays. They are of small, but not pigmy stature (five feet two inches), a fact which may be due to crossing.

^{*} The quotations from this author are taken from his work Les Pygmées. Paris, J. B. Baillière et Fils, 1887.

^{*} Jour. Anthrop. Inst., vii.

⁺ Ibid., iv.

> "Their list of forbidden degrees An extensive morality shows,"

Following the Negritos east amongst the islands, we find in Luzon the Aetas or Inagtas, a group of which is known in Mindanao as Manamouas. The Aetas live side by side with the Tagals, who are of Malay origin. They were called Negritos del Monte by the Spaniards who first colonised these islands. Their average stature, according to Wallace, ranges from four feet six inches to four feet eight inches. In New Guinea, the Karons, a similar race, occupy a chain of mountains parallel to the north coast of the great north-western peninsula. At Port Moresby, in the same island, the Koiari appear to represent the most south-easterly group; but my friend Professor Haddon, who has investigated this district, tells me that he finds traces of a former existence of Negritos at Torres Straits and in North Queensland, as shown by the shape of the skulls of the inhabitants of these regions.

^{*} Man, Jour. Anthrop. Inst., xviii. p. 354.

The Malay Peninsula contains in Perak hill tribes called "savages" by the Sakays. These tribes have not been seen by Europeans, but are stated to be pigmy in stature, troglodytic, and still in the Stone Age. Farther south are the Semangs of Kedah, with an average stature of four feet ten inches, and the Jakuns of Singapore, rising to five feet. The Annamites admit that they are not autochthonous, a distinction which they confer upon the Moïs, of whom little is known, but whose existence and pigmy Negrito characteristics are considered by De Quatrefages as established.

China no longer, so far as we know, contains any representatives of this type, but Professor Lacouperie * has recently shown that they formerly existed in that part of Asia. According to the annals of the Bamboo Books, "In the twenty-ninth year of the Emperor Yao, in spring, the chief of the Tsiao-Yao, or dark pigmies, came to court and offered as tribute feathers from the Mot." The Professor continues, "As shown by this entry, we begin with the semi-historic times as recorded in the 'Annals of the Bamboo Books,' and the date about 2048 B.C. The so-called feathers were simply some sort of marine plant or seaweed with which the immigrant Chinese, still an inland people, were yet unacquainted. The Mot water or river, says the Shan-hai-king, or canonical book of hills and seas, was situated in the south-east of the Tai-shan in Shan-tung. This gives a clue to the localisation of the pigmies. and this localisation agrees with the positive knowledge we possess of the small area which the Chinese dominion covered at this time. Thus the Negritos were part of the native population of China when, in the twenty-third century B.C., the civilised Bak tribes came into the land." In Japan we have also evidence of their existence. This country, now inhabited by the Niphonians, or Japanese, as we have come to call them, was previously the home of the Ainu, a white, hairy under-sized race, possibly, even probably, emigrants from Europe, and now gradually dying out in Yezo and the Kurile Islands. Prior to the Ainu was a Negrito race, whose connection with the former is a matter of much dispute, whose remains in the shape of pit-dwellings, stone arrow-heads, pottery, and other implements still exist, and will be found fully described by Mr. Savage Landor in a recent most interesting work,* In the Shan-hai-king, as Professor Schlegel † points out, their country is spoken of as the Siao-iin-Kouo, or land of little men, in distinction, be it noted, to the Peh-min-Kouo, or land of white people, identified by him with the Ainu. These little men are spoken of by the Ainu as Koro-puk-guru, i.e., according to Milne, men occupying excavations, or pit-dwellers. According to Chamberlain, the name means dwellers under burdocks, and is associated with the following legend. Before the time of the Ainu. Yezo was inhabited by a race of dwarfs, said by some to be two to three feet, by others only one inch in height. When an enemy approached, they hid themselves under the great leaves of the burdock (koro), for which reason they are called Koro-puk-guru, i.e., the men under the burdocks. When they were exterminated by the wooden clubs of the Ainu, they raised their eyes to heaven, and, weeping, cried aloud to the gods, ^{*} Alone with the Hairy Ainu.

^{*} Babylonian and Oriental Record, vol. v.

[†] Problèmes Géographiques. Les Peuples Etrangers chez les Historiens Chinois. Extrait du T'oung-pao, vol. iv. No. 4. Leide, E. J. Brill.

"Why were we made so small?" It should be said that Professor Schlegel and Mr. Savage Landor both seem to prefer the former etymology.

Passing to the north-west of the Andamans, we find in India a problem of considerable difficulty. That there were at one period numerous Negrito tribes inhabiting that part of Asia is indubitable; that some of them persist to this day in a state of approximate purity is no less true, but the influence of crossing has here been most potent. Races of lighter hue and taller stature have invaded the territory of the Negritos, to a certain extent intermarried with them, and thus have originated the various Dravidian tribes. These tribes, therefore, afford us a valuable clue as to the position occupied in former days by their ancestors, the Negritos.

In some of the early Indian legends, De Quatrefages thinks that he finds traces of these prehistoric connections between the indigenous Negrito tribes and their invaders. The account of the services rendered to Rama by Hânuman and his monkey-people may, he thinks, easily be explained by supposing the latter to be a Negrito tribe. Another tale points to unions of a closer nature between the alien races. Bhimasena, after having conquered and slain Hidimba, at first resisted the solicitations of the sister of this monster, who, having become enamoured of him, presented herself under the guise of a lovely woman. But at the wish of his elder brother, Youdhichshira, the king of justice, and with the consent of his mother, he yielded, and passed some time in the dwelling of this Negrito or Dravidian Armida.

It will now be necessary to consider some of these races more or less crossed with alien blood.

In the centre of India, amongst the Vindyah Mountains, live the Djangals or Bandra-Lokhs, the latter name signifying man-monkey, and thus associating itself with the tale of Rama, above alluded to. Like most of the Dravidian tribes, they live in great misery, and show every sign of their condition in their attenuated figures. One of this tribe measured by Rousselet was five feet in height. It may here be remarked that the stature of the Dravidian races exceeds that of the purer Negritos, a fact due, no doubt, to the influence of crossing. Farther south, in the Nilgherry Hills, and in the neighbourhood of the Todas and Badagas, dwell the Kurumbas and Irulas (children of darkness). Both are weak and dwarfish, the latter especially so. They inhabit, says Walhouse, * the most secluded, densely wooded fastnesses of the mountain slopes. They are by popular tradition connected with the aboriginal builders of the rude stone monuments of the district, though, according to the above-mentioned authority, without any claim to such distinction. They, however, worship at these cromlechs from time to time, and are associated with them in another interesting manner. "The Kurumbas of Nulli," says Walhouse, "one of the wildest Nilgherry declivities, come up annually to worship at one of the dolmens on the table-land above, in which they say one of their old gods resides. Though they are regarded with fear and hatred as sorcerers by the agricultural Bădăgas of the tableland, one of them must, nevertheless, at sowingtime be called to guide the first plough for two or three yards, and go through a mystic pantomime of propitiation to the earth deity, without which the crop would certainly fail. When so summoned, the Kurumba must pass the night by the dolmens alone, and I have seen one who had been called from his present dwelling for the morning ceremony, sitting after dark on the capstone of a dolmen, with heels and hams drawn together and chin on knees, looking like some huge ghostly fowl perched on the mysterious stone." Mr. Gomme has drawn attention to this and other similar customs in the interesting remarks which he makes upon the influence of conquered non-Aryan races upon their Aryan subduers.*

^{*} Jour. Anthrop. Inst., vii. 21.

Farther south, in Ceylon, the Veddahs live, whom Bailey † considers to be identical with the hill-tribes of the mainland, though, if this be true, some at least must have undergone a large amount of crossing, judging from the wavy nature of their hair. The author just quoted says, "The tallest Veddah I ever saw, a man so towering above his fellows that, till I measured him, I believed him to be not merely comparatively a tall man, was only five feet three inches in height. The shortest man I have measured was four feet one inch. I should say that of males the ordinary height is from four feet six inches to five feet one inch, and of females from four feet four inches to four feet eight inches."

In the east the Santals inhabit the basin of ^{*} Ethnology and Folk-Lore, p. 46; The Village Community, p. 105. + Trans. Ethn. Soc., ii. 278.

the Ganges, and in the west the Jats belong to the Punjab, and especially to the district of the Indus. The Kols inhabit the delta of the Indus and the neighbourhood of Gujerat, and stretch almost across Central India into Behar and the eastern extremities of the Vindhya Mountains. Other Dravidian tribes are the Oraons, Jouangs, Buihers, and Gounds. All these races have a stature of about five feet, and, though much crossed, present more or less marked Negrito characteristics. Passing farther west, the Brahouis of Beluchistan, a Dravidian race, who regard themselves as the aboriginal inhabitants, live side by side with the Belutchis. Finally, in this direction, there seem to have been near Lake Zerrah, in Persia, Negrito tribes who are probably aboriginal, and may have formed the historic black guard of the ancient kings of Susiana.

An examination of the present localisation of these remnants of the Negrito inhabitants shows how they have been split up, amalgamated with, or driven to the islands by the conquering invaders. An example of what has taken place may be found in the case of Borneo, where Negritos still exist in the centre of the island. The Dyaks chase them like wild beasts, and shoot down the children, who take refuge in the trees. This will not seem in the least surprising to those who have studied the history of the relation between autochthonous races and their invaders. It is the same story that has been told of the Anglo-Saxon race in its dealings with aborigines in America, and notably, in our case, in Tasmania.

Turning from Asia to a continent more closely associated, at least in popular estimation, with pigmy races, we find in Africa several races of dwarf men, of great antiquity and surpassing interest. The discoveries of Stanley, Schweinfurth, Miani, and others have now placed at our disposal very complete information respecting the pigmies of the central part of the continent, with whom it will, therefore, be convenient to make a commencement. These pigmies appear to be divided into two tribes, which, though similar in stature, and alike distinguished by the characteristic of attaching themselves to some larger race of natives, yet present considerable points of difference, so much so as to cause Mr. Stanley to say that they are as unlike as a Scandinavian is to a Turk. "Scattered," says the same authority,*

^{*} In Darkest Africa, vol. ii. p. 92.

"among the Balessé, between Ipoto and Mount Pisgah, and inhabiting the land between the Ngaiyu and Ituri rivers, a region equal in area to about two-thirds of Scotland, are the Wambutti, variously called Batwa, Akka, and Bazungu. These people are under-sized nomads, dwarfs or pigmies, who live in the uncleared virgin forest, and support themselves on game, which they are very expert in catching. They vary in height from three feet to four feet six inches. A full-grown adult may weigh ninety pounds. They plant their village camps three miles around a tribe of agricultural aborigines, the majority of whom are fine stalwart people. They use poisoned arrows, with which they kill elephants, and they capture other kinds of game by the use of traps."

The two groups are respectively called Batwa and Wambutti. The former inhabit the northern parts of the above-mentioned district, the latter the southern. The former have longish heads, long narrow faces, and small reddish eyes set close together, whilst the latter have round faces and open foreheads, gazelle-like eyes, set far apart, and rich yellow ivory complexion. Their bodies are covered with stiffish grey short hair.

Two further quotations from the same source may be given to convey an idea to those ignorant of the original work, if such there be, of the appearances of these dwarfs. Speaking of the queen of a tribe of pigmies, Stanley says,* "She was brought in to see me, with three rings of polished iron around her neck, the ends of which were coiled like a watch-spring. Three iron rings were suspended to each ear. She is of a light-brown complexion with broad round face, large eyes, and small but full lips. She had a quiet modest demeanour, though her dress was but a narrow fork clout of bark cloth. Her height is about four feet four inches, and her age may be nineteen or twenty. I notice when her arms are held against the light a whity-brown fell on them. Her skin has not that silky smoothness of touch common to the Zanzibaris. but altogether she is a very pleasing little creature." To this female portrait may be subjoined one of a male aged probably twenty-one years and four feet in height. + "His colour was coppery, the fell over the body was almost furry, being nearly half an inch long, and his hands were very delicate. On his head he wore a bonnet of a priestly form, decorated with a bunch of parrot feathers, and a broad strip of bark covered his nakedness," Jephson states* that he found continual traces of them from 27° 30' E. long., a few miles above the Equator, up to the edge of the great forest, five days' march from Lake Albert. He also says that they are a hardy daring race, always ready for war, and are much feared by their neighbours. As soon as a party of dwarfs makes its appearance near a village, the chief hastens to propitiate them by presents of corn and such vegetables as he possesses. They never exceed four feet one inch in height, he informs us, and adds a characteristic which has not been mentioned by Stanley, one, too, which is very remarkable when it is remembered how scanty is the facial hair of the Negros and Negritosthe men have often very long beards.

^{*} In Darkest Africa, vol. i. p. 345. † Ibid., ii. 40.

The southern parts of the continent are occupied by the Bushmen, who are vigorous and agile, of a stature ranging from four feet six inches to four feet nine inches, and sufficiently well known to permit me to pass over them without further description. The smallest woman of this race who has been measured was only three feet three inches in height, and Barrow examined one, who was the mother of several children, with a stature of three feet eight inches.

^{*} Emin Pasha, p. 367, et seq.

The Akoas of the Gaboon district were a race of pigmies who, now apparently extinct, formerly dwelt on the north of the Nazareth River. A male of this tribe was photographed and measured by the French Admiral Fleuriot de l'Angle. His age was about forty and his stature four feet six inches.

Flower * says that "another tribe, the M'Boulous, inhabiting the coast north of the Gaboon River, have been described by M. Marche as probably the primitive race of the country. They live in little villages, keeping entirely to themselves, though surrounded by the larger Negro tribes, M'Pongos and Bakalais, who are encroaching upon them so closely that their numbers are rapidly diminishing. In 1860 they were not more than 3000; in 1879 they were much less numerous. They are of an earthy-brown colour, and rarely exceed five feet three inches in height. Another group living between the Gaboon and the Congo, in Ashango-land, a male of which measured four feet six inches, has been described by Du Chaillu.

^{*} Jour. Anth. Inst., xviii. p. 86.

In Loango there is a tribe called Babonko, which was described by Battell in 1625, in the work entitled "Purchas his Pilgrimes," in the following terms:-"To the north-east of Mani-Kesock are a kind of little people called Matimbas, which are no bigger than boyes of twelve yeares old, but very thicke, and live only upon flesh, which they kill in the woods with their bows and darts. They pay tribute to Mani-Kesock, and bring all their elephants' teeth and tayles to him. They will not enter into any of the Maramba's houses, nor will suffer any one to come where they dwell. And if by chance any Maramba or people of Longo pass where they dwell, they will forsake that place and go to another. The women carry bows and arrows as well as the men. And one of these will walk in the woods alone and kill the Pongos with their poysoned arrows." It is somewhat surprising that Tyson, who gives in his essay (p. 80) the account of the same people published at a later date (1686) by Dapper, should have missed his fellow-countryman's narrative. The existence of this tribe has been established by a German expedition, one of the members of which, Dr. Falkenstein, photographed and measured an adult male whose stature was four feet six inches.

Krapf* states that in the south of Schoa, in a part of Abyssinia as yet unworked, the Dokos live, who are not taller than four feet. According to his account, they are of a dark olive colour, with thick prominent lips, flat noses, small eyes, and long flowing hair. They have no dwellings, temples, holy trees, chiefs, or weapons, live on roots and fruit, and are ignorant of fire. Another group was described by Mollieu in 1818 as inhabiting Tenda-Maié, near the Rio Grande, but very little is known about them. In a work entitled "The Dwarfs of Mount Atlas," Halliburton † has brought forward a number of statements to prove that a tribe of dwarfs, named like those of Central Africa, Akkas, of a reddish complexion and with short woolly hair, live in the district adjoining Soos. These dwarfs have been alluded to by Harris and Dönnenburg, ‡ but Mr. Harold Crichton Browne,* who has explored neighbouring districts, is of opinion that there is no such tribe, and that the accounts of them have been based upon the examination of sporadic examples of dwarfishness met with in that as in other parts of the world.

+ London, Nutt, 1891. ‡ Nature, 1892, ii. 616.

^{*} Morgenblatt, 1853 (quoted by Schaafhausen, Arch. f. Anth., 1866, p. 166).

Finally, in Madagascar it is possible that there may be a dwarf race. Oliver t states that "the Vazimbas are supposed to have been the first occupants of Ankova. They are described by Rochon, under the name of Kunios, as a nation of dwarfs averaging three feet six inches in stature, of a lighter colour than the Negroes, with very long arms and woolly hair. As they were only described by natives of the coast, and have never been seen, it is natural to suppose that these peculiarities have been exaggerated; but it is stated that people of diminutive size still exist on the banks of a certain river to the south-west." There are many tumuli of rude work and made of rough stones throughout the country, which are supposed to be their tombs. In idolatrous days, says Mullens, t the Malagasy deified the Vazimba, and their so-called tombs were the most sacred objects in the country. In this account may be found further evidence in favour of Mr. Gomme's theory, to which attention has already been called.

In the great continent of America there does not appear to have ever been, so far as our present knowledge teaches, any pigmy race. Dr. Brinton, the distinguished American ethnologist, to whom I applied for information on this point, has been good enough to write to me that, in his opinion, there is no evidence of any pigmy race in America. The "little people" of the "stone graves" in Tennessee, often supposed to be such, were children, as the bones testify. The German explorer Hassler has alleged the existence of a pigmy race in Brazil, but testimony is wanting to support such allegation. There are two tribes of very short but not pigmy stature in America, the Yahgans of Tierra del Fuégo and the Utes of Colorado, but both of these average over five feet.

Leaving aside for the moment the Lapps, to whom I shall return, there does not appear to have been at any time a really pigmy race in Europe, so far as any discoveries which have been made up to the present time show. Professor Topinard, whose authority upon this point cannot be gainsaid, informs me that the smallest race known to him in Central Europe is that of the pre-historic people of the Lozère, who were Neolithic troglodytes, and are represented probably at the present day by some of the peoples of South Italy and Sardinia. Their average stature was about five feet two inches. closely corresponds with what is known of the stature of the Platycnemic race of Denbighshire. the Perthi-Chwareu. Busk * says of them that they were of low stature, the mean height, deduced from the lengths of the long bones, being little more than five feet. As both sexes are considered together in this description, it is fair to give the male a stature of about five feet two inches.† It also corresponds with the stature ^{*} Jour. Ethn. Soc., 1869-70, p. 455.

[†] Since these pages were printed, Prof. Kollmann, of Basle, has described a group of Neolithic pigmies as having existed at Schaffhausen. The adult interments consisted of the remains of full-grown European types and of small-sized people. These two races were found interred side by side under precisely similar conditions, from which he concludes that they lived peaceably together, notwithstanding racial difference. Their stature (about three feet six inches) may be compared with that of the Veddahs in Ceylon. Prof. Kollmann believes that they were a distinct species of mankind.

assigned by Pitt-Rivers to a tribe occupying the borders of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire during the Roman occupation, the average height of whose males and females was five feet two and a half inches and four feet ten and three-quarter inches respectively.

Dr. Rahon,* who has recently made a careful study of the bones of pre-historic and protohistoric races, with special reference to their stature, states that the skeletons attributed to the most ancient and to the Neolithic races are of a stature below the middle height, the average being a little over five feet three inches. The peoples who constructed the Megalithic remains of Roknia and of the Caucasus, were of a stature similar to our own. The diverse protohistoric populations, Gauls, Franks, Burgundians, and Merovingians, considered together, present a stature slightly superior to that of the French of the present day, but not so much so as the accounts of the historians would have led us to believe.

It remains now to deal with two races whose physical characters are of considerable importance in connection with certain points which will be dealt with in subsequent pages, I mean the Lapps and the Innuit or Eskimo.

^{*} Recherches sur les Ossements Humaines, Anciens et Préhistoriques. Mém. de la Soc. d'Anthrop. de Paris, Sér. ii. tom. iv. 403.

The Lapps, according to Karonzine,* one of their most recent describers, are divisible into two groups, Scandinavian and Russian, the former being purer than the latter race. The average male stature is five feet, a figure which corresponds closely with that obtained by Mantegazza and quoted by Topinard. The extremes obtained by this observer amongst men were, on the one hand, five feet eight inches, and on the other four feet four inches. As, however, in a matter of this kind we have to deal with averages and not with extremes, we must conclude that the Lapps, though a stunted race, are not pigmies, in the sense in which the word is scientifically employed.

The Innuit or Eskimo were called by the original Norse explorers "Skraelingjar," or dwarfs, a name now converted by the Innuit into "karalit," which is the nearest approach that they are able to make phonetically to the former term. They are certainly, on the average, a people of less than middle stature, yet they can in no sense be described as Pigmies. Their mean height is five feet three inches. Nansen * says of them, "It is a common error amongst us in Europe to think of the Eskimo as a diminutive race. Though no doubt smaller than the Scandinavian peoples, they must be reckoned amongst the middle-sized races, and I even found amongst those of purest breeding men of nearly six feet in height."

^{*} L'Anthropologie, ii. 80.

IT.

The raison d'être of Tyson's essay was to explain away the accounts of the older writers relating to Pigmy races, on the ground that, as no such races existed, an explanation of some kind was necessary in order to account for so many and such detailed descriptions as were to be found in their works. Having now seen not merely that there are such things as Pigmy races, but that they have a wide distribution throughout the world, it may be well to consider to which of the existing or extinct races, the above-mentioned accounts may be supposed to have referred. In this task I am much aided in several instances by the labours of De Quatrefages, and as his book is easily accessible, it will be unnecessary for me to repeat the arguments in favour of his decisions which he has there given.

Starting with Asia, we have in the first place the statement of Pliny, that "immediately after the nation of the Prusians, in the mountains where it is said are pigmies, is found the Indus." These Pigmies may be identified with the Brahouis, now Dravidian, but still possessing the habit, attributed to them by Pliny, of changing their dwellings twice a year, in summer and winter, migrations rendered necessary by the search for food for their flocks. The same author's allusion to the "Spithamæi Pygmæi" of the mountains in the neighbourhood of the Ganges may apply to the Santals or some allied tribe, though Pliny's stature for them of two feet four inches is exaggeratedly diminutive, and he has confused them with Homer's Pigmies, who were, as will be seen, a totally different people.

Ctesias * tells us that "Middle India has black men, who are called Pygmies, using the same language as the other Indians; they are, however, very little; that the greatest do not exceed the height of two cubits, and the most part only of one cubit and a half. But they nourish the longest hair, hanging down unto the knees, and even below; moreover, they carry a beard more at length than any other men; but, what is more, after this promised beard is risen to them, they never after use any clothing, but send down, truly, the hairs from the back much below the knees, but draw the beard before down to the feet; afterward. when they have covered the whole body with hairs, they bind themselves, using those in the place of a vestment. They are, moreover, apes and deformed. Of these Pygmies, the king of the Indians has three thousand in his train; for they are very skilful archers." No doubt the actual stature has been much diminished in this account, and, as De Quatrefages suggests. the garment of long floating grasses which they may well have worn, may have been mistaken for hair; yet, in the description, he believes that he is able to recognise the ancestors of the Bandra-Lokh of the Vindhya Mountains.

^{*} The quotation is taken from Ritson, Fairy Tales, p. 4.

Ctesias' other statement, that "the king of India sends every fifth year fifty thousand swords, besides abundance of other weapons, to the nation of the Cynocephali," may refer to the same or some other tribe.

De Quatrefages also thinks that an allusion to the ancestors of the Jats, who would then have been less altered by crossing than now, may be found in Herodotus' account of the army of Xerxes when he says, "The Eastern Ethiopians serve with the Indians. They resemble the other Ethiopians, from whom they only differ in language and hair. The Eastern Ethiopians have straight hair, while those of Lybia are more woolly than all other men."

Writing of isles in the neighbourhood of Java, Maundeville says,* "In another yle, ther ben litylle folk, as dwerghes; and thei ben to so meche as the Pygmeyes, and thei han no mouthe, but in stede of hire mouthe, thei han a lytylle round hole; and whan thei schulle eten or drynken, thei taken thorghe a pipe or a penne or suche a thing, and sowken it in, for thei han no tongue, and therefore thei speke not, but thei maken a maner of hissynge, as a Neddre dothe, and thei maken signes on to another, as monkes don, be the whiche every of hem undirstondethe the other."

^{*} Ed. Halliwell, p. 205.

Strip this statement of the characteristic Maundevillian touches with regard to the mouth and tongue, and it may refer to some of the insular races which exist or existed in the district of which he is treating.

A much fuller account * by the same author relates to Pigmies in the neighbourhood of a river, stated by a commentator + to be the Yangtze-Kiang, "a gret ryvere, that men clepen Dalay, and that is the grettest ryvere of fressche water that is in the world. For there, as it is most narow, it is more than 4 myle of brede. And thanne entren men azen in to the lond of the great Chane. That ryvere gothe thorge the lond of Pigmaus, where that the folk ben of litylle stature, that ben but 3 span long, and thei ben right faire and gentylle, aftre here quantytees, bothe the men and the women. And thei maryen hem, whan thei ben half zere of age and getten children. And thei lyven not, but 6 zeer or 7 at the moste. And he that lyveth 8 zeer, men holden him there * Maundeville, p. 211. † Quart. Rev., 172, p. 431.

xlvi

righte passynge old. Theise men ben the beste worcheres of gold, sylver, cotoun, sylk, and of alle such thinges, of ony other, that be in the world. And thei han often tymes werre with the briddes of the contree, that thei taken and eten. This litylle folk nouther labouren in londes ne in vynes. But thei han grete men amonges hem, of oure stature, that tylen the lond, and labouren amonges the vynes for hem. And of the men of oure stature, han thei als grete skorne and wondre, as we wolde have among us of Geauntes, zif thei weren amonges There is a gode cytee, amonges othere, where there is duellynge gret plentee of the lytylle folk, and is a gret cytee and a fair, and the men ben grete that duellen amonges hem; but whan thei getten ony children, thei ben als litylle as the Pygmeyes, and therefore thei ben alle, for the moste part, alle Pygmeyes, for the nature of the land is suche. The great Cane let kepe this cytee fulle wel, for it is his. And alle be it, that the Pygmeyes ben litylle, zit thei ben fulle resonable, aftre here age and connen bothen wytt and gode and malice now." This passage, as will be noted, incorporates the Homeric tale of the battles between the Pigmies and the Cranes, and is adorned with a representation of such an encounter. Maundeville's dwarfs were the same as the Siao-Jin of the Shan-hai-King is a question difficult to decide; but, in any case, both these pigmy races of legend inhabited a part of what is now the Chinese Empire. The same Pigmies seem to be alluded to in the rubric of the Catalan map of the world in the National Library of Paris, the date of which is A.D. 1375. "Here (N.W. of Catayo-Cathay) grow little men who are but five palms in height, and though they be little, and not fit for weighty matters, yet they be brave and clever at weaving and keeping cattle." If such an explanation may be hazarded, we may perhaps go further and suppose that Paulus Jovius may have been alluding to the Koro-pukguru, when, as Pomponius Mela tells us, he taught that there were Pigmies beyond Japan. In both these cases, however, it is well to remember that there is a river in Macedon as well as in Monmouth, and that it is hazardous to come to too definite a belief as to the exact location of the Pigmies of ancient writers.

The continent of Africa yielded its share of Pigmies to the same writers. The most celebrated of all are those alluded to by Aristotle in his classical passage. "They (the Cranes) come out of Scythia to the Lakes above Egypt whence the Nile flows. This is the place whereabouts the Pigmies dwell. For this is no fable but a truth. Both they and the horses, as 'tis said, are of a small kind. They are Troglodytes and live in caves."

Leaving aside the crane part of the tale, which it has been suggested may really have referred to ostriches, Aristotle's Pigmy race may, from their situation, be fairly identified with the Akkas described by Stanley and others. That this race is an exceedingly ancient one is proved by the fact that Marriette Bey has discovered on a tomb of the ancient Empire of Egypt a figure of a dwarf with the name Akka inscribed by it. This race is also supposed to have been that which, alluded to by Homer, has become confused with other dwarf tribes in different parts of the world.

[&]quot;So when inclement winters vex the plain
With piercing frosts or thick-descending rain,
To warmer seas the cranes embodied fly,
With noise and order, through the midway sky;
To Pigmy nations wounds and death they bring,
And all the war descends upon the wing."

Attention may here be drawn to Tyson's quotation (p. 78) from Vossius as to the trade driven by the Pigmies in elephants' tusks, since, as we have seen, this corresponds with what we now know as to the habits of the Akkas.

The account which Herodotus gives of the expedition of the Nasamonians is well known. Five men, chosen by lot from amongst their fellows, crossed the desert of Lybia, and, having marched several days in deep sand, perceived trees growing in the midst of the plain. They approached and commenced to eat the fruit which they bore. Scarcely had they begun to taste it, when they were surprised by a great number of men of a stature much inferior to the middle height, who seized them and carried them off. They were eventually taken to a city, the inhabitants of which were black. Near this city ran a considerable river whose course was from west to east, and in which crocodiles were found. In his account of the Akkas, Mr. Stanley believed that he had discovered the representatives of the Pigmies mentioned in this history. Speaking of one of these, he says,* "Twenty-six centuries ago his ancestors captured the five young Nasamonian explorers, and made merry with them at their villages on the banks of the Niger." It may be correct to say that, at the period alluded to, the dwarf races of Africa were in more continuous occupancy of the land than is now the case, but such an identification as that just mentioned gives a false idea of the position of the Pigmies of Herodotus. De Quatrefages, after a most careful examination of the question in all its aspects, finds himself obliged to conclude, either that the Pigmy race seen by the Nasamonians still exists on the north of the Niger, which has been identified with the river alluded to by Herodotus, but has not, up to the present, been discovered; or that it has disappeared from those regions.

^{*} Op. supra cit., ii. 40.

Pomponius Mela has also his account of African Pigmies. Beyond the Arabian Gulf, and at the bottom of an indentation of the Red Sea, he places the Panchæans, also called Ophiophagi, on account of the fact that they fed upon serpents. More within the Arabian bay than the Panchæans are the Pigmies, a minute race, which became exterminated in the wars which it was compelled to wage with the Cranes for the preservation of its fruits. The region indicated somewhat corresponds with that which is assigned to the Dokos by their describer. In this district, too, other dwarf races have been reported. The French writer whom I have so often cited says, "The tradition of Eastern African Pigmies has never been lost by the Arabs. At every period the geographers of this nation have placed their River of Pigmies much more to the south. It is in this region, a little to the north of the Equator, and towards the 32° of east longitude, that the Rev. Fr. Léon des Avanchers has found the Wa-Berrikimos or Cincallès, whose stature is about four feet four inches. The information gathered by M. D'Abbadie places towards the 6° of north latitude the Mallas or Mazé-Malléas, with a stature of five feet. Everything indicates that there exist, at the south of the Galla country, different negro tribes of small stature. It seems difficult to me not to associate them with the Pigmies of Pomponius Mela. Only they have retreated farther south. Probably this change had already taken place at the time when the Roman geographer wrote; it is, therefore, comprehensible that he may have regarded them as having disappeared."

li

Tyson (p. 29) quotes the following passage from Photius:-"That Nonnosus sailing from Pharsa, when he came to the farthermost of the islands, a thing very strange to be heard of happened to him; for he lighted on some (animals) in shape and appearance like men, but little of stature, and of a black colour, and thick covered with hair all over their bodies. The women, who were of the same stature, followed the men. They were all naked, only the elder of them, both men and women, covered their privy parts with a small skin. They seemed not at all fierce or wild: they had a human voice, but their dialect was altogether unknown to everybody that lived about them, much more to those that were with Nonnosus. They lived upon sea-oysters and fish that were cast out of the sea upon the island. They had no courage for seeing our men; they were frighted, as we are at the sight of the greatest wild beast." It is not easy to identify this race with any existing tribe of Pigmies, but the hairiness of their bodies, and above all their method of clothing themselves, leave no doubt that in this account we have a genuine story of some group of smallstatured blacks.

From the foregoing account it will be seen that it is possible with more or less accuracy and certainty to identify most of those races which, described by the older writers, had been rejected by their successors. Time has brought their revenge to Aristotle and Pliny by showing that they were right, where Tyson, and even Buffon, were wrong.

III.

The little people of story and legend have a much wider area of distribution than those of real life, and it is the object of this section to give some idea of their localities and dwellings. Imperfect as such an account must necessarily be, it will yet suffice I trust in some measure to show that, like the England of Arthurian times, all the world is "fulfilled of faëry."

In dealing with this part of the subject, it would be possible, following the example of Keightley, to treat the little folk of each country separately. But a better idea of their nature, and certainly one which for my purpose will be more satisfactory, can, I think, be obtained by classifying them according to the nature of their habitations, and mentioning incidentally such other points concerning them as it may seem advisable to bring out.

I. In the first place, then, fairies are found dwelling in mounds of different kinds, or in the interior of hills. This form of habitation is so frequently met with in Scotch and Irish accounts of the fairies, that it will not be necessary for me to burden these pages with instances, especially since I shall have to allude to them in a further section in greater detail. Suffice it to say, that many instances of such an association in the former country will be found in the pages of Mr. MacRitchie's works, whilst as to the latter, I shall content myself by quoting Sir William Wilde's statement, that every green "rath" in that country is consecrated to the "good people." In England there are numerous instances of a similar kind. Gervase of Tilbury in the thirteenth century mentions such a spot in Gloucestershire: "There is in the county of Gloucester a forest abounding in boars, stags, and every species of game that England produces. In a grovy lawn of this forest there is a little mount, rising in a point to the height of a man," With this mount he associates the familiar story of the offering of refreshment to travellers by its unseen inhabitants. In Warwickshire, the mound upon which Kenilworth Castle is built was formerly a fairy habitation.* Ritson + mentions that the "fairies frequented many parts of the Bishopric of Durham." There is a hillock or tumulus near Bishopton, and a large hill near Billingham, both of which used in former time to be "haunted by fairies." Even Ferry-hill, a wellknown stage between Darlington and Durham, is evidently a corruption of "Fairy-hill." In Yorkshire a similar story attaches to the sepulchral barrow of Willey How, 1 and in Sussex to a green mound called the Mount in the parish of Pulborough. § The fairies formerly frequented Bussers Hill in St. Mary's Isle, one of the Scilly group. || The Bryn-yr-

^{*} Testimony of Tradition, p. 142.

⁺ Op. cit., p. 56.

[‡] Folk Lore, ii. 115.

[§] Folk Lore Record, i. 16 and 28.

^{||} Ritson, p. 62.

Ellyllon,* or Fairy-hill, near Mold, may be cited as a similar instance in Wales, which must again be referred to.

The pages of Keightlev's work contain instances of hill-inhabiting fairies in Scandinavia, Denmark, the Isle of Rügen, Iceland, Germany, and Switzerland. It is not only in Europe, however, that this form of habitation is to be met with; we find it also in America. The Sioux have a curious superstition respecting a mound near the mouth of the Whitestone River, which they call the Mountain of Little People or Little Spirits; they believe that it is the abode of little devils in the human form, of about eighteen inches high and with remarkably large heads; they are armed with sharp arrows. in the use of which they are very skilful. These little spirits are always on the watch to kill those who should have the hardihood to approach their residence. The tradition is that many have suffered from their malice, and that, among others, three Maha Indians fell a sacrifice to them a few years since. This has inspired all the neighbouring nations, Sioux, Mahas, and Ottoes, with such terror, that no consideration could tempt them to visit the hill.*

^{*} Dawkins, Early Man in Britain, p. 433.

The mounds or hills inhabited by the fairies are, however, of very diverse kinds, as we discover when we attempt to analyse their actual nature. In some cases they are undoubtedly natural elevations. Speaking of the exploration of the Isle of Unst, Hunt † says that the term "Fairy Knowe" is applied alike to artificial and to natural mounds. "We visited," he states, "two 'Fairy Knowes' in the side of the hill near the turning of the road from Reay Wick to Safester, and found that these wonderful relics were merely natural formations. The workmen were soon convinced of this, and our digging had the effect of proving to them that the fairies had nothing to do with at least two of these hillocks." The same may surely be said of that favourite and important fairy haunt Tomnahurich, near Inverness, though Mr. MacRitchie seems to think that an investigation, ^{*} Lewis and Clarke, Travels to the Source of the Missouri River. Quoted in Flint Chips, p. 346. The tale is also given in Folk Lore, Oriental and American (Gibbings & Co.), p. 45.

[†] Anthrop. Mems., ii. 294.

were such possible, of its interior, might lead to a different explanation.

In other cases, and these are of great importance in coming to a conclusion as to the origin of fairy tales, the mounds inhabited by the little people are of a sepulchral nature. This is the case in the instance of Willey How, which, when explored by Canon Greenwell, was found, in spite of its size and the enormous care evidently bestowed upon its construction, to be merely a cenotaph. A grave there was, sunk more than twelve feet deep in the chalk rock; but no corporeal tenant had ever occupied it.

This fact is still more clearly shown in the remarkable case mentioned by Professor Boyd Dawkins. A barrow called Bryn-yr-Ellyllon (Fairy-hill), near Mold, was said to be haunted by a ghost clad in golden armour which had been seen to enter it. The barrow was opened in the year 1832, and was found to contain the skeleton of a man wearing a golden corselet of Etruscan workmanship.

The same may be said respecting that famous fairy-hill in Ireland, the Brugh of the Boyne, though Mr. MacRitchie seems to regard it as having been a dwelling-place. Mr. Coffey in a most careful study appears to me to have finally settled the question.* He speaks of the remains as those of probably the most remarkable of the pre-Christian cemeteries of Ireland. Of the stone basins, whose nature Mr. MacRitchie regards as doubtful, he says, "There can be hardly any doubt but that they served the purpose of some rude form of sarcophagus, or of a receptacle for urns." Mr. Coffey quotes the account from the Leadhar na huidri respecting cemeteries, in which Brugh is mentioned as amongst the chief of those existing before the faith (i.e. before the introduction of Christianity). "The nobles of the Tuatha de Danann were used to bury at Brugh (i.e. the Dagda with his three sons; also Lugaidh, and Oe, and Ollam, and Ogma, and Etan the Poetess, and Corpre. the son of Etan), and Cremthain followed them. because his wife Nar was of the Tuatha Dear and it was she solicited him that he should adopt Brugh as a burial-place for himself and his descendants, and this was the cause that they did not bury at Cruachan." Mr. Coffey also quotes O'Hartagain's poem, which seems to bear in Mr. MacRitchie's favour:—

^{*} Tumuli at New Grange. Trans. Roy. Irish Academy,

"Behold the sidhe before your eyes:

It is manifest to you that it is a king's mansion,
Which was built by the firm Dagda;
It was a wonder, a court, a wonderful hill."

But certain of the expressions in this are evidently to be taken figuratively, since Mr. Coffey states, in connection with this and other quotations, that their importance consists in that they establish the existence at a very early date of a tradition associating Brugh na Boinne, the burial-place of the kings of Tara, with the tumuli on the Boyne. The association of particular monuments with the Dagda and other divinities and heroes of Irish mythology implies that the actual persons for whom they were erected had been forgotten, the pagan traditions being probably broken by the introduction of Christianity. The mythological ancestors of the heroes and kings interred at Brugh, who probably were even contemporarily associated with the cemetery, no doubt subsequently overshadowed in tradition the actual persons interred there.

Finally, it seems that the fairy hills may have been actual dwelling-places, fortified or not, of prehistoric peoples. Such were no doubt some of the Picts' houses so fully dealt with by Mr. MacRitchie, though Petrie * seems to have considered that many of these were sepulchral in their nature. Such were also the Raths of Ireland and fortified hills, like the White Cater Thun of Forfarshire.

The interior of the mound-dwellings, as described in the stories, is a point to which allusion should be made. Sometimes the mound contains a splendid palace, adorned with gold and silver and precious stones, like the palace of the King of Elfland in the tale of "Childe Rowland." In the Scandinavian mound-stories we find a curious incident, for they are described as being capable of being raised upon red pillars, and as being so raised when the occupants gave a feast to their neighbours. "There are three hills on the lands of Bubbelgaard in Funen, which are to this day called the Dance-hills, from the following occurrence. A lad named Hans was at service in Bubbelgaard, and as he was coming one evening past the hills, he saw one of them raised on red pillars, and great dancing and much merriment underneath."* This feature is met with in several of the stories collected by Keightley, and is made use of in Cruikshank's picture, which forms the frontispiece to that volume. Lastly, in a number of cases there is not merely a habitation, but a vast country underneath the mound. An instance of this occurs in the tale of John Dietrich from the Isle of Rügen. Under the Nine-hills he found "that there were in that place the most beautiful walks, in which he might ramble along for miles in all directions, without ever finding an end of them, so immensely large was the hill that the little people lived in, and yet outwardly it seemed but a little hill, with a few bushes and trees growing on it." †

^{*} Anthrop. Mems., ii. 216.

2. The haunts of the fairies may be in caves, and examples of this form of dwelling-place are to be met with in different parts of the world. The Scandinavian hill people live in caves or small hills, and the Elves or dwarfs of La Romagna "dwell in lonely places, far away in the mountains, deep in them, in caves or among old ruins and rocks," as Mr. Leland,* who gives a tale respecting these little people, tells us. A Lithuanian tale † tells "how the hero, Martin, went into a forest to hunt, accompanied by a smith and a tailor. Finding an empty hut, they took possession of it; the tailor remained in it to cook the dinner, and the others went forth to the chase. When the dinner was almost ready, there came to the hut a very little old man with a very long beard, who piteously begged for food. After receiving it, he sprang on the tailor's neck and beat him almost to death. When the hunters returned, they found their comrade groaning on his couch, complaining of illness, but saying nothing about the bearded dwarf. Next day the smith suffered in a similar way; but when it came to Martin's turn, he proved too many and too strong for the dwarf. whom he overcame, and whom he fastened by the beard to the stump of a tree. But the dwarf tore himself loose before the hunters came back from the forest and escaped into a cavern.

^{*} Quoted by Keightley (p. 9), from Thiele, i. 118. + Keightley, 178.

^{*} Etrusco Roman Remains, p. 222.

[†] Folk Lore Record, i. 85. Mr. Hartland points out to me that this tale, being a Märchen, does not afford quite such good evidence of belief as actually or recently existing as a saga.

Tracing him by the drops of blood which had fallen from him, the three companions came to the mouth of the cavern, and Martin was lowered into it by the two others. Within it he found three princesses, who had been stolen by three dragons. These dragons he slew, and the princesses and their property he took to the spot above which his comrades kept watch, who hoisted them out of the cavern, but left Martin in it to die. As he wandered about disconsolately, he found the bearded dwarf, whom he slew. And soon afterwards he was conveyed out of the cavern by a flying serpent, and was able to punish his treacherous friends, and to recover the princesses, all three of whom he simultaneously married."

Amongst the Magyars,* also, in some localities caves are pointed out as the haunts of fairies, such as the caves in the side of the rock named Budvár, the cave Borza-vára, near the castle of Dame Rapson; another haunt of the fairies is the cave near Almás, and the cold wind known as the "Nemere" is said to blow when the fairy in Almás cave feels cold. On one occasion the plague was raging in this neighbourhood; the people ascribed it to the cold blast emanating from the cave; so they hung shirts before the mouth of the cave and the plague ceased.

^{*} Jones and Kropf, Folk Tales of the Magyars, pp. xxxvi. et seq.

In a widely distant part of the world, the Battaks-Karo,* of the high ground north of Lake Toba in Sumatra, believe in three classes of mysterious beings, one of which closely corresponds with the fairies of Europe. The first group are called Hantous; they are giants and dead Begous (i.e. definitely dead souls), who inhabit Mount Sampouran together with the second group. These are called Omangs; they are dwarfs who marry and reproduce their species, live generally in mountains, and have their feet placed transversely. They must be propitiated, and those making the ascent of Mount Sébayak sacrifice a white hen to them, or otherwise the Omangs would throw stones at them. They carry off men and women, and often keep them for years. They love to dwell amongst stones, and the Roumah Omang, which is one of their favourite habitations, is a cavern. The third group, or Orangs Boumans, resemble ordinary beings, but have the power of making themselves invisible. They come down from the mountains to buy supplies, but have not been seen for some time. Westenberg, from whom this information is quoted, regards the last class as being proscribed Battaks, who have fled for refuge to the mountains. Passing to another continent, the Iroquois * have several stories about Pigmies, one of whom, by name Go-ga-ah, lives in a little cave.

^{*} L'Anthropologie, iv. 83.

3. The little people may occupy a castle or house, or the hill upon which such a building is erected, or a cave under it. Without dwelling upon the Brownies and other similar distinctly household spirits, there are certain classes which must be mentioned in this connection. The Magyar fairies live in castles on lofty mountain They build them themselves, or inherit them from giants. Kozma enumerates the names of about twenty-three castles which belonged to fairies, and which still exist. Although they have disappeared from earth, they continue to live, even in our days, in caves under their castles, in which caves their treasures lie hidden. The iron gates of Zeta Castle, which have subsided into the ground and disappeared from the surface, open once in every seven years. On one occasion a man went in there, and met two beautiful fairies whom he addressed thus, "How long will you still linger here, my little sisters?" and they replied, "As long as the cows will give warm milk."

^{*} Smith, Myths of the Iroquois. American Bureau of Ethnology, ii. 65.

Like the interior of some of the mound-dwellings already mentioned, these fairy caves are splendid habitations. "Their subterranean habitations are not less splendid and glittering than were their castles of yore on the mountain peaks. The one at Firtos is a palace resting on solid gold columns. The palace at Tartod and the gorgeous one of Dame Rapson are lighted by three diamond balls, as big as human heads, which hang from golden chains. The treasure which is heaped up in the latter place consists of immense gold bars, golden lions with carbuncle eyes, a golden hen with her brood, and golden casks, filled with gold coin, The treasures of Fairy Helen are kept in a cellar under Kovászna Castle, the gates of the cellar being guarded by a magic cock. This bird only goes to sleep once in seven years, and anybody who could guess the right moment would be able to scrape no end of diamond crystals from the walls and bring them out with him. The fairies who guard the treasures of the Pogányvár (Pagan Castle) in Marosszék even nowadays come on moonlight nights to bathe in the lake below."* In Brittany, "a number of little men, not more than a foot high, dwell under the castle of Morlaix. They live in holes in the ground, whither they may often be seen going, and beating on basins. They possess great treasures, which they sometimes bring out; and if any one pass by at the time, allow him to take one handful, but no more. Should any one attempt to fill his pockets, the money vanishes, and he is instantly assailed by a shower of boxes on the ear from invisible hands." + In the Netherlands, the "Gypnissen," "queer little women," lived in a castle which had been reared in a single night. I The Ainu have tales of the Poiyaumbe, a name which means literally "little beings residing on the soil" (Mr. Batchelor says that "little" is probably meant to express endearment or admiration, but one may be allowed to doubt this). Ainu, who is the hero of the story, "comes to a tall mountain with a beautiful house built on its ^{*} Folk Tales of the Magyars, p. xxxviii.

⁺ Grimm, apud Keightley, 441.

[#] Testimony of Tradition, p. 86.

summit. Descending, for his path had always been through the air, by the side of the house, and looking through the chinks of the door, he saw a little man and a little woman sitting beside the fireplace." *

4. The little people or fairies occupy rude stone monuments or are connected with their building. In Brittany they are associated with several of the megalithic remains. † "At Carnac, near Quiberon," says M. De Cambry, "in the department of Morbihan, on the sea-shore, is the Temple of Carnac, called in Breton 'Ti Goriquet' (House of the Gories), one of the most remarkable Celtic monuments extant. It is composed of more than four thousand large stones, standing erect in an arid plain, where neither tree nor shrub is to be seen, and not even a pebble is to be found in the soil on which they stand. If the inhabitants are asked concerning this wonderful monument, they say it is an old camp of Cæsar's, an army turned into stone, or that it is the work of the Crions or Gorics. These they describe as little men between two and three feet high, who carried these enormous masses on their hands; for, though little, they are stronger than giants. Every night they dance around the stones, and woe betide the traveller who approaches within their reach! he is forced to join in the dance, where he is whirled about till, breathless and exhausted, he falls down, amidst the peals of laughter of the Crions. All vanish with the break of day. In the ruins of Tresmalouen dwell the Courils. They are of a malignant disposition, but great lovers of dancing. At night they sport around the Druidical monu-The unfortunate shepherd that approaches them must dance their rounds with them till cockcrow; and the instances are not few of persons thus ensnared who have been found next morning dead with exhaustion and fatigue. ' Woe also to the ill-fated maiden who draws near the Couril dance! nine months after, the family counts one member more. Yet so great is the cunning and power of these dwarfs, that the young stranger bears no resemblance to them, but they impart to it the features of some lad of the village."

^{*} Folk Lore Journal, vi. 195.

[†] Keightley, 440.

In India megalithic remains are also associated with little people. "Dwarfs hold a distinct place in Hindu mythology; they appear sculptured on all temples. Siva is accompanied by a body-guard of dwarfs, one of whom, the three-legged Bhringi, dances nimbly. But coming nearer to Northern legend, the cromlechs and kistvaens which abound over Southern India are believed to have been built by a dwarf race, a cubit high, who could, nevertheless, move and handle the huge stones easily. The villagers call them Pandayar."*

Mr. Meadows Taylor, speaking of cromlechs in India, says, "Wherever I found them, the same tradition was attached to them, that they were Morie humu, or Mories' houses; these Mories having been dwarfs who inhabited the country before the present race of men." Again, speaking of the cromlechs of Koodilghee, he states, "Tradition says that former Governments caused dwellings of the description alluded to to be erected for a species of human beings called 'Mohories,' whose dwarfish stature is said not to have exceeded a span when standing, and a fist high when in a sitting posture, who were endowed with strength sufficient to roll off large stones with a touch of their thumb." There are, he also tells us, similar traditions attaching to other places, where the dwarfs are sometimes spoken of as Gujaries.*

^{*} Folk Lore, iv. 401.

Of stone structures built by fairies or little people for the use of others, may be mentioned the churches built by dwarfs in Scotland and Brittany, and described by Mr. MacRitchie, as also the two following instances, taken from widely distant parts of the globe. In Brittany, the dolmen of Manné-er Hrock (Montaigne de la Fee), at Locmariaquer, is said to have been built by a fairy, in order that a mother might stand upon it and look out for her son's ship.† In Fiji the following tale is told about the Nanga or sacred stone enclosure :- "This is the word of our fathers concerning the Nanga. Long ago their fathers were ignorant of it; but one day two strangers were found sitting in the Rara (public square), and they said they had come up from the sea to give them the Nanga. They were little men, and very dark-skinned, and one of them had his face and bust painted red, while the other was painted black. Whether these were gods or men our fathers did not tell us, but it was they who taught our people the ^{*} Jour. Ethnol. Soc., 1868-69, p. 157.

[†] Flint Chips, p. 104.

Nanga. This was in the old times, when our fathers were living in another land—not in this place, for we are strangers here." * It is worthy of note that the term "Nanga" applies not merely to the enclosure, but also to the secret society which held its meetings therein.†

5. The little people make their dwellings either in the interior of a stone or amongst stones. I am not here alluding to the stones on the sides of mountains which are the doorways to fairy dwellings, but to a closer connection, which will be better understood from some of the following instances than from any lengthy explanation. The Duergas of the Scandinavian Eddas had their dwelling-places in stones, as we are told in the story of Thorston, who "came one day to an open part of the wood, where he saw a great rock, and out a little way from it a dwarf, who was horridly ugly." In Ireland, in Innisbofin, co. Galway, Professor Haddon relates that the men who were quarrying a rock in the neighbourhood of the harbour refused to work at it any longer, as it was so full of "good people" as to be hot.* In England the Pixy-house of Devon is in a stone. and a large stone is also connected with the story of the Frensham caldron, though it is not clear that the fairies lived in the rock itself. † Oseberrow or Osebury (vulgo Rosebury) Rock, in Lulsey, Worcestershire, was, according to tradition, a favourite haunt of the fairies. † In another part of Worcestershire, on the side of the Cotswolds, there is, in a little spinney, a large flat stone, much worn on its under surface, which is called the White Lady's Table. This personage is supposed to take her meals with the fairies at this rock, but what the exact relation of the little people to it as a dwelling-place may be, I have not been able to learn.

^{*} Fison, Journ. Anthrop, Inst., xiv. 14.

⁺ Joske, Internat. Arch. f. Ethnographie, viii. 254.

[‡] Keightley, 70.

There is an Iroquois tale of dwarfs, in which the summons to the Pigmies was given by knocking upon a large stone.§ The little people of Melanesia seem also to be associated in some measure with stones. Speaking of these beings, ^{*} Folklore, iv. 49.

[†] Ritson, 106, quoting Aubrey's Natural History of Surrey, iii. 366.

[‡] Allies, Antiquities and Folk-Lore of Worcestershire, p. 443.

[§] Smith, Myths of Iroquois, ut supra.

Mr. Codrington says,* "There are certain Vuis having rather the nature of fairies. The accounts of them are vague, but it is argued that they had never left the islands before the introduction of Christianity, and indeed have been seen since. Not long ago there was a woman living at Mota who was the child of one, and a very few years ago a female Vui with a child was seen in Saddle Island. Some of these were called Nopitu, which come invisibly, or possess those with whom they associate themselves. The possessed are called Nopitu. Such persons would lift a cocoa-nut to drink, and native shell money would run out instead of the juice and rattle against their teeth; they would vomit up money, or scratch and shake themselves on a mat, when money would pour from their fingers. This was often seen, and believed to be the doing of a Nopitu. In another manner of manifestation, a Nopitu would make himself known as a party were sitting round an evening fire. A man would hear a voice in his thigh, 'Here am I, give me food.' He would roast a little red yam, ^{*} Journ. Anthrop. Inst., x. 261.

and fold it in the corner of his mat. He would soon find it gone, and the Nopitu would begin a song. Its voice was so small and clear and sweet, that once heard it never could be forgotten; but it sang the ordinary Mota songs. Such spirits as these, if seen or found, would disappear beside a stone; they were smaller than the native people, darker, and with long straight hair. But they were mostly unseen, or seen only by those to whom they took a fancy. They were the friendly Trolls or Robin Goodfellows of the islands; a man would find a fine red vam put for him on the seat beside the door, or the money which he paid away returned within his purse. A woman working in her garden heard a voice from the fruit of a gourd asking for some food, and when she pulled up an arum or dug out a yam, another still remained; but when she listened to another spirit's panpipes, the first in his jealousy conveyed away garden and all." Amongst the Australians also supernatural beings dwell amongst the rocks, and the Annannites and Arabians know of fairies living amongst the rocks and hills.*

^{*} Hartland, Science of Fairy Tales, p. 351.

6. The little people may have their habitation in forests or trees. Such were the Skovtrolde, or Wood-Trolls of Thorlacius,* who made their home on the earth in great thick woods, and the beings in South Germany who resemble the dwarfs, and are called Wild, Wood, Timber and Moss People, † "These generally live together in society, but they sometimes appear singly. They are small in stature, yet somewhat larger than the Elf, being the size of children of three years, grey and old-looking, hairy and clad in moss. Their lives are attached, like those of the Hamadryads, to the trees, and if any one causes by friction the inner bark to loosen, a Woodwoman dies." In Scandinavia there is also a similarity between certain of the Elves and Hamadryads. The Elves "not only frequent trees, but they make an interchange of form with them. In the churchyard of Store Heddinge, in Zeeland, there are the remains of an oak-wood. These, say the common people, are the Elle King's soldiers; by day they are trees, by night valiant soldiers. In the wood of Rugaard, in the same island, is a tree which by night becomes a whole Elle-people, and goes about all alive. It has no leaves upon it, yet it would be very unsafe to go to break or fell it, for the underground people frequently hold their meetings under its branches. There is, in another place, an elder-tree growing in a farmyard, which frequently takes a walk in the twilight about the yard, and peeps in through the window at the children when they are alone. The linden or lime-tree is the favourite haunt of the Elves and cognate beings, and it is not safe to be near it after sunset." * In England, the fairies also in some cases frequent the woods, as is their custom in the Isle of Man, and in Wales, where there was formerly, in the park of Sir Robert Vaughan, a celebrated old oak-tree, named Crwben-yr-Ellyl, or the Elf's Hollow Tree. In Formosa; there is also a tale of little people inhabiting a wood. "A young Botan became too ardent in his devotion to a young lady of the tribe, and was slain by her relatives, while, as a warning as to the necessity for love's fervour being kept within bounds, his seven brothers were banished by the chief. The exiles went forth into the depths of the forest, and in their wanderings after a new land they crossed a small clearing, in which a little girl, about a span in height, was seated peeling potatoes. 'Little sister,' they queried, 'how come you here? where is your home?' 'I am not of homes nor parents,' she replied. Leaving her, they went still farther into the forest, and had not gone far when they saw a little man cutting canes, and farther on to the right a curious-looking house, in front of which sat two diminutive women combing their hair. Things looked so queer that the travellers hesitated about approaching nearer, but, eager to find a way out of the forest, they determined in their extremity to question the strange people. The two women. when interrogated, turned sharply round, showing eyes of a flashing red; then looking upward, their eyes became dull and white, and they immediately ran into the house, the doors and windows of which at once vanished, the whole taking the form and appearance of an isolated boulder." Amongst the Maories also we have "te tini ote hakuturi," or "the multitude of the wood-elves," the little people who put the chips all back into the tree Rata had felled and stood it up again, because he had not paid tribute to Tane.*

^{*} Quoted by Keightley, p. 62.

[†] Grimm ap. Keightley, p. 230.

^{*} Keightley, p. 92, quoting from Thiele.

⁺ Folk Lore Journal, v. 143.

7. The association of little people with water as a home is a widespread notion. The Sea-Trows of the Shetlanders inhabit a region of their own at the bottom of the sea. They here respire a peculiar atmosphere, and live in habitations constructed of the choicest submarine productions. They are, however, not always small, but may be of diverse statures, like the Scandinavian Necks. In Germany the Water-Dwarfs are also known. At Seewenheiher, in the Black Forest, a little water-man (Seemännlein) used to come and join the people, work the whole day along with them, and in the evening go back into the lakes. The size of the Breton Korrigs or Korrigan, if we may believe Villemarqué in his account of this folk, does not exceed two feet, but their proportions are most exact, and they have long flowing hair, which they comb out with great care. Their only dress is a long white veil, which they wind round their body. Seen at night or in the dusk of the evening, their beauty is great; but in the daylight their eyes appear red, their hair is white, and their faces wrinkled; hence they rarely let themselves be seen by day. They are fond of music, and have fine voices, but are not much given to dancing. Their favourite haunts are the springs, by which they sit and comb their hair.* The Maories also have their Water-Pigmies, the Ponaturi, who are, according to Mr. Tregear, elves, little tiny people, mostly dwellers in water, coming ashore to sleep. † "The spirits most commonly met with in African mythology," says Mr. Macdonald, "are water or river spirits, inhabiting deep pools where there are strong eddies and under-currents. Whether they are all even seen now-a-days it is difficult to determine, but they must at one time have either shown themselves willingly, or been dragged from their hiding-places by some powerful magician, for they are one and all described. They are dwarfs, and correspond to the Scottish conception of kelpies or fairies. They are wicked and malevolent beings, and are never credited with a good or generous action. Whatever they possess they keep, and greedily seize upon any one who comes within their reach. 'One of them, the Incanti, corresponds to the Greek Python, and another, called Hiti, appears in the form of a small and very ugly man, and is exceedingly malevolent' (Brownlee). It is certain death to see an Incanti, and no one but the magicians sees them except in dreams, and in that case the magicians are consulted, and advise and direct what is to be done."*

^{*} Tregear, Journ. Anth. Inst., xix. 121.

[†] Grimm ap. Keightley, p. 261.

^{*} Villemarqué, ibid., 431.

⁺ Tregear, ut supra.

Dr. Nansen, speaking of the Ignerssuit (plural of Ignersuak, which means "great fire"), says that they are for the most part good spirits, inclined to help men. The entrance to their dwellings is on the sea-shore. According to the Eskimo legend, "The first earth which came into existence had neither seas nor mountains, but was quite smooth. When the One above was displeased with the people upon it, He destroyed the world. It burst open, and the people fell down into the rifts and became Ignerssuit and the water poured over everything." † The spirits here alluded to appear to be the same as those described by Mr. Boas as Uissuit in his monograph on the Central Eskimo. He describes them as "a strange people that live in the sea. They are dwarfs, and are frequently seen between Iglulik and Netchillik, where the Anganidien live, an Innuit tribe whose women are in the habit of tracing rings around their eves. There are men and women among the Uissuit, and they live in deep water, never coming to the surface. When the Innuit wish to see them, they go in their boats to a place where they cannot see the bottom, and try to catch them with hooks which they slowly move up and down. As soon as they get a bite they draw in the line. The Uissuit are thus drawn up; but no sooner do they approach the surface than they dive down headlong again, only their legs having emerged from the water. The Innuit have never succeeded in getting one out of the water." *

^{*} Journ. Anthrop. Inst., xx. 124.

⁺ Nansen, ut supra, p. 259.

8. Amongst habitations not coming under any of the above categories may be mentioned the moors and open places affected by the Cornish fairies, and lastly the curious residences of the Kirkonwaki or Church-folk of the Finns. "It is an article of faith with the Finns that there dwell under the altar in every church little misshapen beings which they call Kirkonwaki, i.e., Church-folk. When the wives of these little people have a difficult labour, they are relieved if a Christian woman visits them and lays her hand upon them. Such service is always rewarded by a gift of gold and silver."* These folk evidently correspond to the Kirkgrims of Scandinavian countries, and the traditions respecting both are probably referable to the practice of foundation sacrifices.

^{*} American Bureau of Ethnology, vi. 612.

`IV.

The subject of Pigmy races and fairy tales cannot be considered to have been in any sense fully treated without some consideration of a theory which, put forward by various writers and in connection with the legends of diverse countries, has recently been formulated by Mr. MacRitchie in a number of most interesting and suggestive books and papers. An early statement of this theory is to be found in a paper by Mr. J. F. Campbell, in which he stated, "It is somewhat remarkable that traditions still survive in the Highlands of Scotland which seem to be derived from the habits of Scotch tribes like the Lapps in our day. Stories are told in Sutherlandshire about a 'witch' who milked deer; a 'ghost' once became acquainted with a forester, and at his suggestion packed all her plenishing on a herd of deer. when forced to flit by another and a bigger 'ghost;' the green mounds in which 'fairies' are supposed to dwell closely resemble the outside of Lapp huts. The fairies themselves are not represented as airy creatures in gauze wings and spangles, but they appear in tradition as small cunning people, eating and drinking, living close at hand in their green mound, stealing children and cattle, milk and food, from their bigger neighbours. They are uncanny, but so are the Lapps. My own opinion is that these Scotch traditions relate to the tribes who made kitchen-middens and lake-dwellings in Scotland, and that they were allied to Lapps." * Such in essence is Mr. MacRitchie's theory, which has been so admirably summarised by Mr. Jacobs in the first of that series of fairy-tale books

^{*} Grimm ap. Keightley, p. 488.

^{*} Journ. Ethnol. Soc., 1869-70, p. 325.

lxxxvi

which has added a new joy to life, that I shall do myself the pleasure of quoting his statement in this place. He says: "Briefly put, Mr. MacRitchie's view is that the elves, trolls, and fairies represented in popular tradition are really the mound-dwellers, whose remains have been discovered in some abundance in the form of green hillocks, which have been artificially raised over a long and low passage leading to a central chamber open to the sky. Mr. MacRitchie shows that in several instances traditions about trolls or 'good people' have attached themselves to mounds which long afterwards, on investigation, turned out to be evidently the former residence of men of smaller build than the mortals of to-day. He goes on further to identify these with the Picts-fairies are called 'Pechs' in Scotland—and other early races, but with these ethnological equations we need not much concern ourselves. It is otherwise with the mound traditions and their relation, if not to fairy tales in general, to tales about fairies, trolls, elves, &c. These are very few in number, and generally bear the character of anecdotes. The fairies, &c., steal a child; they help a wanderer to a drink and then disappear into a green hill; they help cottagers with their work at night, but disappear if their presence is noticed; human midwives are asked to help fairy mothers; fairy maidens marry ordinary men, or girls marry and live with fairy husbands. All such things may have happened and bear no such a priori marks of impossibility as speaking animals, flying through the air, and similar incidents of the folk-tale pure and simple. If, as archæologists tell us, there was once a race of men in Northern Europe very short and hairy, that dwelt in underground chambers artificially concealed by green hillocks, it does not seem unlikely that odd survivors of the race should have lived on after they had been conquered and nearly exterminated by Arvan invaders, and should occasionally have performed something like the pranks told of fairies and trolls."* the same place, and also in another article, the writer just quoted has applied this theory to the explanation of the story of "Childe Rowland."

Mr. MacRitchie has, in another paper,‡ collected a number of instances of the use of the word Sith in connection with hillocks and tumuli, which are the resort of the fairies. Here also he discusses the possible connection of that word with that of Tshud, the title of the vanished supernatural inhabitants of the land amongst the Finns and other "Altaic" Turanian tribes of Russia, as in other places he has endeavoured to trace a connection between the Finns and the Feinne. Into these etymological questions I have no intention to enter, since I am not qualified to do so, nor is it necessary, as they have been fully dealt with by Mr. Nutt, whose opinion on this point is worthy of all attention.* But it may be permitted to me to inquire how far Mr. MacRitchie's views tally with the facts mentioned in the foregoing section. I shall therefore allude to a few points which appear to me to show that the origin of the belief in fairies cannot be settled in so simple a manner as has been suggested, but is a question of much greater complexity—one in which, as Mr. Tylor says, more than one mythic element combines to make up the whole.

^{*} English Fairy Tales, p. 241.

[†] Folk Lore, ii. 126.

[‡] Journ. Roy. Soc. Antiq. Ireland, iii. 367.

(1.) In the first place, then, it seems clear, so far as our present knowledge teaches us, that there never was a really Pigmy race inhabiting the northern parts of Scotland.

^{*} Folk and Hero Tales from Argyleshire, p. 420.

The scanty evidence which we have on this point, so far as it goes, proves the truth of this assertion. Mr. Carter Blake found in the Muckle Heog of the Island of Unst, one of the Shetlands, together with stone vessels, human interments of persons of considerable stature and of great muscular strength. Speaking of the Keiss skeletons, Professor Huxley says that the males are, the one somewhat above, and the other probably about the average stature; while the females are short, none exceeding five feet two inches or three inches in height.* And Dr. Garson, treating of the osteology of the ancient inhabitants of the Orkneys, says that the female skeleton which he examined was about five feet two inches in height, i.e., about the mean height of the existing races of England. † There is no evidence that Lapps and Eskimo ever visited these parts of the world; and if they did, as we have seen, their stature, though stunted, ^{*} Laing, Prehistoric Remains of Caithness, p. 101.

⁺ Journ. Anthrop. Inst., xiii. 60.

cannot fairly be described as pigmy. Even if we grant that the stature of the early races did not average more than five feet two inches, which, by the way, was the height of the great Napoleon, it is more than doubtful whether it fell so far short of that of succeeding races as to cause us to imagine that it gave rise to tales about a race of dwarfs.

- (2.) The mounds with which the tales of little people are associated have not, in many cases, been habitations, but were natural or sepulchral in their nature. It may, of course, be argued that the story having once arisen in connection with one kind of mound, may, by a process easy to understand, have been transferred to other hillocks similar in appearance, though diverse in nature. It is difficult to see, however, how this could have occurred in Yorkshire and other parts of England, where it is not argued that the stunted inhabitants of the North ever penetrated. It is still more difficult to explain how similar legends can have originated in America in connection with mounds, since there never were Pigmy races in that continent.
 - (3.) The rude and simple arrangements of the interior of these mound dwellings might have, in the process of time, become altered into the gorgeous halls, decked with gold and silver and precious stones, as we find them in the stories; they might even, though this is much more difficult to understand, have become possessed of the capacity for being raised upon red pillars. But there is one pitch to which, I think, they could never have attained, and that is the importance which they assume when they become the external covering of a large and extensive tract of underground country. Here we are brought face to face with a totally different explanation, to which I shall recur in due course.

(4.) The little people are not by any means associated entirely with mounds, as the foregoing section is largely intended to show. Their habitations may be in or amongst stones, in caves, under the water, in trees, or amongst the glades of a forest; they may dwell on mountains, on moors, or even under the altars of churches. We may freely grant that some of these habitations fall into line with Mr. MacRitchie's theory, but they are not all susceptible of such an explanation.

(5.) The association of giants and dwarfs in certain places, even the confusion of the two races, seems somewhat difficult of explanation by this theory. In Ireland the distinction between the two classes is sharper than in other places, since, as Sir William Wilde pointed out, whilst every green rath in that island is consecrated to the fairies or "good people," the remains attributed to the giants are of a different character and probably of a later date. In some places, however, a mound similar to those often connected with fairies is associated with a giant, as is the case at Sessay parish, near Thirsk,* and at Fyfield in Wiltshire. The chambered tumulus at Luckington is spoken of as the Giant's Caves, and that at Nempnet in Somersetshire as the Fairy's Toot. In Denmark, tumuli seem to be described indifferently as Zettestuer (Giants' Chambers) or Troldestuer (Fairies' Chambers). † In "Beowulf" a chambered tumulus is described, in the recesses of which were treasures watched over for three hundred years by a dragon. This barrow was of stone, and the work of giants.

^{*} Folk Lore, i. 130.

[†] Flint Chips, p. 412.

Seah on enta geweorc, hû őa stân-bogan, stapulinn-faeste, êce eorő-reced innan healde. Looked on the giant's work, how the stone arches, on pillars fast, the eternal earth-house held within.

The mounds have sometimes been made by giants and afterwards inhabited by dwarfs, as in the case of the Nine-hills, already alluded to. In others, they are at the same time inhabited by giants, dwarfs, and others, as in the story of the Dwarf's Banquet,* and still more markedly in the Wunderberg. "The celebrated Wunderberg, or Underberg, on the great moor near Salzburg, is the chief haunt of the Wild-women. The Wunderberg is said to be quite hollow, and supplied with stately palaces, churches, monasteries, gardens, and springs of gold and silver. Its inhabitants, beside the Wild-women, are little men, who have charge of the treasures it contains, and who at midnight repair to Salzburg to perform their devotions in the cathedral; giants, who used to come to the church of Grödich and exhort the people to lead a godly and pious life; and the great Emperor Charles V., with golden crown and sceptre, attended by knights and lords. His grey beard has twice encompassed the table at which he sits, and when it has the third time grown round it, the end of the world and the appearance of the Antichrist will take place." *

^{*} Grimm ap. Keightley, 130.

In the folk-tales of the Magyars we meet with a still more remarkable confusion between these two classes of beings. Some of the castles described in these stories are inhabited by giants, others by fairies. Again, the giants marry; their wives are fairies, so are their daughters. They had no male issue, as their race was doomed to extermination. They fall in love, and are fond of courting. Near Bikkfalva, in Háromszék, the people still point out the "Lover's Bench" on a rock where the amorous giant of Csigavár used to meet his sweetheart, the "fairy of Veczeltetö," †

(6.) Tales of little people are to be found in countries where there never were any Pigmy races. Not to deal with other, and perhaps more debatable districts, we find an excellent example of this in North America. Besides the instances mentioned in the foregoing section, the following may be mentioned. Mr. Leland, ^{*} Grimm ap. Keightley, 234.

⁺ Folk Tales of the Magyars, p. xxix.

speaking of the Un-a-games-suk, or Indian spirits of the rocks and streams, says that these beings enter far more largely, deeply, and socially into the life and faith of the Indians than elves or fairies ever did into those of the Aryan race.* In his Algonquin Legends the same author also alludes to small people.

Dr. Brinton tells me that the Micmacs have tales of similar Pigmies, whom they call Wiguladumooch, who tie people with cords during their sleep, &c. Mr. L. L. Frost, of Susanville, Lassen County, California, tells us how, when he requested an Indian to gather and bring in all the arrow-points he could find, the Indian declared them to be "no good," that they had been made by the lizards. Whereupon Mr. Frost drew from him the following lizard-story. "There was a time when the lizards were little men, and the arrow-points which are now found were shot by them at the grizzly bear. The bears could talk then, and would eat the little men whenever they could catch them. The arrows of the little men were so small that they would not kill the bears when shot into them, and only served to enrage them." The Indian could not tell how the little men became transformed into lizards.* Again, the Shoshones of California dread their infants being changed by Ninumbees or dwarfs.†

^{*} Memoirs, i. 34.

Finally, every one has read about the Puk-wudjies, "the envious little people, the fairies, the pigmies," in the pages of Longfellow's "Hiawatha." ‡ It ought to be mentioned that Mr. Leland states that the red-capped, scanty-shirted elf of the Algonquins was obtained from the Norsemen; but if, as he says, the idea of little people has sunk so deeply into the Indian mind, it cannot in any large measure have been derived from this source. §

(7.) The stunted races whom Mr. MacRitchie considers to have formed the subjects of the fairy legend have themselves tales of little people. This is true especially of the Eskimo, as will have been already noticed, a fact to which my attention was called by Mr. Hartland.

For the reasons just enumerated, I am unable to accept Mr. MacRitchie's theory as a complete ^{*} Folk Lore Journal, vii. 24.

[†] Hartland, ut supra, p. 351.

[‡] xviii.

[§] Etrusco Roman Remains, p. 162.

explanation of the fairy question, but I am far from desirous of under-estimating the value and significance of his work. Mr. Tylor, as I have already mentioned, states, in a sentence which may vet serve as a motto for a work on the whole question of the origin of the fairy myth, that "various different facts have given rise to stories of giants and dwarfs, more than one mythic element perhaps combining to form a single legend—a result perplexing in the extreme to the mythological interpreter." * And I think it may be granted that Mr. MacRitchie has gone far to show that one of these mythic elements, one strand in the twisted cord of fairy mythology, is the half-forgotten memory of skulking aborigines, or, as Mr. Nutt well puts it, the "distorted recollections of alien and inimical races." But it is not the only one. It is far from being my intention to endeavour to deal exhaustively with the difficult question of the origin of fairy tales. Knowledge and the space permissible in an introduction such as this would alike fail me in such a task. It may, however, be permissible to mention a few points which seem to impress themselves upon one in making a study of the stories with which I have been dealing. In the first place, one can scarcely fail to notice how much in common there is between the tales of the little people and the accounts of that underground world, which, with so many races, is the habitation of the souls of the departed. Dr. Callaway has already drawn attention to this point in connection with the ancestor-worship of the Amazulu.* He says, "It may be worth while to note the curious coincidence of thought among the Amazulu regarding the Amatongo or Abapansi, and that of the Scotch and Irish regarding the fairies or 'good people.' For instance, the 'good people' of the Irish have assigned to them in many respects the same motives and actions as the Amatongo. They call the living to join them, that is, by death; they cause disease which common doctors cannot understand nor cure; they have their feelings, interests, partialities, and antipathies, and contend with each other about the living. The common people call them their friends or people, which is equivalent to the term abakubo given to the Amatongo. They reveal themselves in the form of the dead, and it appears to be supposed that the dead become 'good people,' as the dead among the Amazulu become Amatongo; and in funeral processions of the 'good people' which some have professed to see, are recognised the forms of those who have just died, as Umkatshana saw his relatives amongst the Abapansi. The power of holding communion with the 'good people' is consequent on an illness, just as the power to divine amongst the natives of this country. So also in the Highland tales, a boy who had been carried away by the fairies, on his return to his own home speaks of them as 'our folks,' which is equivalent to abakwetu, applied to the Amatongo, and among the Highlands they are called the 'good people' and 'the folk.' They are also said to 'live underground,' and are therefore Abapansi or subterranean. They are also, like the Abapansi, called ancestors. Thus the Red Book of Clanranald is said not to have been dug up, but to have been found on the moss; it seemed as if the ancestors sent it." There are other points which make in the same direction. The soul is supposed by various races to be a little man, an idea which at once links the manes of the departed with Pigmy people. Thus Dr. Nansen tells us that amongst the Eskimo a man has many souls. The largest dwell in the larynx and in the left side, and are tiny men about the size of a sparrow. The other souls dwell in other parts of the body, and are the size of a finger-joint.* And the Macusi Indians † believe that although the body will decay, "the man in our eyes" will not die, but wander about; an idea which is met with even in Europe, and which perhaps gives us a clue to the conception of smallness in size of the shades of the dead. Again, the belief that the soul lives near the resting-place of its body is widespread, and at least comparable with, if not equivalent to, the idea that the little people of Scotland, Ireland, Brittany, and India live in the sepulchral mounds or cromlechs of those countries. Closely connected with this is the idea of the underground world, peopled by the souls of the departed like the Abapansi, the widespread nature of which idea is shown by Dr. Tylor. "To take one example, in which the more limited idea seems to have preceded the more extensive, the Finns,* who feared the ghost of the departed as unkind, harmful beings, fancied them dwelling with their bodies in the grave, or else, with what Castrén thinks a later philosophy, assigned them their dwelling in the subterranean Tuonela. Tuonela was like this upper earth; the sun shone there, there was no lack of land and water, wood and field, tilth and meadow: there were bears and wolves, snakes and pike, but all things were of a hurtful, dismal kind; the woods dark and swarming with wild beasts, the water black, the cornfields bearing seed of snake's teeth; and there stern, pitiless old Tuoni, and his grim wife and son, with the hooked fingers with iron points, kept watch and ward over the dead 'lest they should escape."

^{*} Primitive Culture, i. 388.

^{*} Religious System of the Amazulu, p. 226.

^{*} Nansen, ut supra, p. 227.

[†] Tylor, ut supra, i. 431.

It is impossible not to see a connection between such conceptions as these and the underground habitations of the little people entered by the green mound which covered the bones of the dead. But the underground world was not only associated with the shades of the departed; it was in many parts of the world the place whence races had their origin, and here also we meet in at least one instance known to me with the conception of a little folk. A very widespread legend in Europe, and especially in Scandinavia, according to Dr. Nansen, tells how the underground or invisible people came into existence. "The Lord one day paid a visit to Eve as she was busy washing her children. All those who were not yet washed she hurriedly hid in cellars and corners and under big vessels, and presented the others to the Visitor. The Lord asked if these were all, and she answered 'Yes;' whereupon He replied, 'Then those which are dulde (hidden) shall remain hulde (concealed, invisible). And from them the huldre-folk are sprung."* There is also the widespread story of an origin underground, as amongst the Wasabe, a sub-gens of the Omahas, who believe that their ancestors were made under the earth and subsequently came to the surface. † There is a similar story amongst the Zūnis of Western New Mexico. In journeying to their present place of habitation, they passed through four worlds, all in the interior of this, the passage way from darkness to light being through a large reed. From the inner world they were led by the two little war-gods, Ah-ai-ū-ta and Mā-ā-sē-we, twin brothers, sons of the Sun, who were sent by the Sun to bring this people to his presence.* From these stories it would appear that the underground world, whether looked upon as the habitation of the dead or the place of origination of nations, is connected with the conception of little races and people. That it is thus responsible for some portion of the conception of fairies seems to me to be more than probable.

^{*} Tylor, ut supra, ii. 80.

^{*} Nansen, ut supra, p. 262.

[†] Dorset, Omaha Sociology. American Bureau of Ethnology, iii, 211.

It is hardly necessary to allude to those spirits which animistic ideas have attached amongst other objects and places, to trees and wells. They are fully dealt with in Dr. Tylor's pages, and must not be forgotten in connection with the present question.

To sum up, then, it appears as if the idea, so widely diffused, of little, invisible, or only sometimes visible, people, is of the most complex nature. From the darkness which shrouds it, however, it is possible to discern some rays of light. That the souls of the departed, and the underground world which they inhabit, are largely responsible for it, is, I hope, rendered probable by the facts which I have brought forward. That animistic ideas have played an important part in the evolution of the idea of fairy peoples, is not open to doubt. That to these conceptions were superadded many features really derived from the actions of aboriginal races hiding before the destroying might of their invaders, and this not merely in these islands, but in many parts of the world, has been, I think, demonstrated by the labours of the gentleman whose theory I have so often alluded to. But the point upon which it is desired to lay stress is that the features derived from aboriginal races are only one amongst many sources. Possibly they play an important part, but scarcely, I think, one so important as Mr. MacRitchie would have us believe.

^{*} Stevenson, Religious Life of Zuni Child. American Bureau of Ethnology, v. 539.

civ

A

PHILOLOGICAL ESSAY

Concerning the

PYGMIES,

THE

CYNOCEPHALI,

THE

SATYRS and SPHINGES

OF THE

ANCIENTS,

Wherein it will appear that they were all either APES or MONKEYS; and not MEN, as formerly pretended.

By Edward Tyfon M. D.

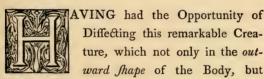

Philological Essay

Concening the

PYGMIES

OF THE

ANCIENTS.

likewise in the structure of many of the Inward Parts, so nearly resembles a Man, as plainly appears by the Anatomy I have here given of it, it suggested the Thought to me, whether this sort of Animal, might not give the Foundation to the Stories of the Pygmies? and afford an occasion not only to the Poets, but Historians too, of inventing the many Fables and wonderful and merry Relations, that are transmitted down down to us concerning them? I must confess, I could never before entertain any other Opinion about them, but that the whole was a Fiction: and as the first Account we have of them, was from a Poet, so that they were only a Creature of the Brain, produced by a warm and wanton Imagination, and that they never had any Existence or Habitation elsewhere.

In this Opinion I was the more confirmed, because the most diligent Enquiries of late into all the Parts of the inhabited World, could never discover any such Puny diminutive Race of Mankind. That they should be totally destroyed by the Cranes, their Enemies, and not a Straggler here and there left remaining, was a Fate, that even those Animals that are constantly preyed upon by others, never undergo. Nothing therefore appeared to me more Fabulous and Romantick, than their History, and the Relations about them, that Antiquity has delivered to us. And not only Strabo of old, but our greatest Men of Learning of late, have wholly exploded them, as a mere figment; invented only to amuse, and divert the Reader with the Comical Narration of their Atchievements, believing that there were never any fuch Creatures in Nature.

This opinion had fo fully obtained with me, that I never thought it worth the Enquiry, how they came to invent fuch Extravagant Stories: Nor should I now, but upon the Occasion of Diffecting this Animal: For observing that 'tis call'd even to this day in the Indian or Malabar Language, Orang-Outang, i.e. a Man of the Woods, or Wild-men; and being brought from Africa, that part of the World, where the Pygmies are faid to inhabit; and it's present Stature likewife tallying fo well with that of the Pygmies of the Ancients; these Considerations put me upon the fearch, to inform my felf farther about them, and to examine, whether I could meet with any thing that might illustrate their History. For I thought it strange, that if the whole was but a meer Fiction, that fo many fucceeding Generations should be so fond of preserving a Story, that had no Foundation at all in Nature; and that the Ancients should trouble themselves so much about them. If therefore I can make out in this Effay, that there were fuch Animals as Pugmies; and that they were not a Race of Men, but Apes; and can discover the Authors, who have forged all, or most of the idle Stories concerning them; and shew how the Cheat in after Ages has been carried on, by embalming the Bodies of Apes, then exposing them for the Men of the Country, from whence they brought them: If I can do this, I shall think my time not wholly loft, nor the trouble altogether ufelefs, that I have had in this Enquiry.

much

6

My Defign is not to justifie all the Relations that have been given of this Animal, even by Authors of reputed Credit; but, as far as I can, to diftinguish Truth from Fable; and herein, if what I affert amounts to a Probability, 'tis all I pretend to. I shall accordingly endeavour to make it appear, that not only the Pygmies of the Ancients, but also the Cynocephali, and Satyrs and Sphinges were only Apes or Monkeys, not Men, as they have been represented. But the Story of the Pygmies being the greatest Imposture, Imposture, I shall chiefly concern my felf about them, and shall be more concise on the others, since they will not need so strict an Examination.

We will begin with the Poet Homer, who is generally owned as the first Inventor of the Fable of the Pygmies, if it be a Fable, and not a true Story, as I believe will appear in the Account I shall give of them. Now Homer only mentions them in a Simile, wherein he compares the Shouts that the Trojans made, when they were going to joyn Battle with the Græcians, to the great Noise of the Cranes, going to fight the Pygmies: he faith,*

"Αι τ' ἐπεὶ οὖν χειμῶνα φύγον, καὶ αθέσφατον ὅμβρον Κλαγγῷ ταί γε πέτονται ἐπ' ἀκεανοῖο ῥοάων 'Ανδράσι πυγμαίοισι φόνον καὶ κῆρα φέρουσαι. i.e.

Quæ simul ac fugere Imbres, Hyememque Nivalem Cum magno Oceani clangore ferantur ad undas Pygmæis pugnamque Viris, cædesque ferentes.

^{*} Homer. Iliad. lib. 3. ver. 4.

Or as Helius Eobanus Heffus paraphrases the whole.*

Postquam sub Ducibus digesta per agmina stabant Quæque suis, Equitum turmæ, Peditumque Cohortes,

Obvia torquentes Danais vestigia Troës
Ibant, sublato Campum clamore replentes:
Non secus ac cuneata Gruum sublime volantum Agmina, dum fugiunt Imbres, ac frigora Brumæ, Per Cælum matutino clangore feruntur,
Oceanumque petunt, mortem exitiumque cruentum
Irrita Pigmæis moturis arma ferentes

By ἀνδράσι πυγμαίοισι therefore, which is the Passage upon which they have grounded all their fabulous Relations of the Pygmies, why may not Homer mean only Pygmies or Apes like Men. Such an Expression is very allowable in a Poet, and is elegant and fignificant, especially since there is so good a Foundation in Nature for him to use it, as we have already seen, in the Anatomy of the Orang-Outang. Nor is a Poet tied to that strictness of Expression, as an Historian or Philofopher; he has the liberty of pleafing the Reader's Phancy, by Pictures and Representations of his own. If there be a becoming likeness, 'tis all that he is accountable for. I might therefore here make the fame Apology for him, as Strabo * do's on another account for his Geography, ou γαρ κατ' άγνοιαν των τοπικών λέγεται, άλλ' ήδονης καὶ τέρψεως χάριν. That he faid it, not thro' Ignorance, but to please and delight: Or, as in another place he expresses himself, to vàp κατ' άγνοιαν της Ιστορίας ύποληπτέον γένεσθαι τοῦτο, άλλά τραγωδίας γάριν. Homer did not make this flip thro' Ignorance of the true History, but for the Beauty of his Poem. So that tho' he calls them Men Pygmies, yet he may mean no more by it, than that they were like Men. As to his Purpose, 'twill ferve altogether as well, whether this bloody Battle be fought between the Cranes and Pygmæan Men, or the Cranes and Apes, which from their Stature he calls Pygmies, and ^{*} Strabo Geograph. lib. I. p. m. 25.

^{*} Homeri Ilias Latino Carminereddita ab Helio Eobano Heffo.

⁺ Strabo ibid. p. m. 30.

from their shape Men; provided that when the Cranes go to engage, they make a mighty terrible noise, and clang enough to fright these little Wights their mortal Enemies. To have called them only Apes, had been slat and low, and lessened the grandieur of the Battle. But this Periphrasis of them, ἄνδρες πυγμαῖοι, raises the Reader's Phancy, and surprises him, and is more becoming the Language of an Heroic Poem.

But how came the Cranes and Pygmies to fall out? What may be the Cause of this Mortal Feud, and constant War between them? For Brutes, like Men, don't war upon one another, to raise and encrease their Glory, or to enlarge their Empire. Unless I can acquit my self herein, and assign some probable Cause hereof, I may incur the same Censure as Strabo* passed on several of the Indian Historians, ενεκαίνισαν δε και την 'Ομηρικήν τῶν Πυγμαίων γερανομαχίαν τρισπιθάμεις εἴποντες, for reviewing the Homerical Fight of the Cranes and Pygmies, which he looks upon only as a fiction of the Poet. But this had been very unbecoming Homer to take a Simile (which is defigned for illustration) from what had no Foundation in Nature. His Betrachomyomachia, 'tis true, was a meer Invention, and never otherwise esteemed: But his Geranomachia hath all the likelyhood of a true Story. And therefore I shall enquire now what may be the just Occasion of this Quarrel.

^{*} Strabo Geograph. lib. 2. p. m. 48.

Athenœus* out of Philochorus, and so likewise Ælian,† tell us a Story, That in the Nation of the Pygmies the Male-line failing, one Gerana was the Queen; a Woman of an admired Beauty, and whom the Citizens worshipped as a Goddess; but she became so vain and proud, as to prefer her own, before the Beauty of all the other Goddess, at which they grew enraged; and to punish her for her Insolence, Athenœus tells us that it was Diana, but Ælian saith 'twas Juno that transformed her into a Crane, and made her an Enemy to the Pygmies that worshipped her before. But since they are not agreed which Goddess' 'twas, I shall let this pass.

^{*} Athenæi Deipnosoph. lib. 9 p. m. 393.

⁺ Ælian. Hift. Animal. lib. 15. cap. 29.

Pomponius Mela will have it, and I think fome others, that these cruel Engagements use to happen, upon the Cranes coming to devour the Corn the Pygmies had sowed; and that at last they became so victorious, as not only to destroy their Corn, but them also: For he tells us,* Fuere interiùs Pygmæi, minutum genus, & quod pro satis frugibus contra Grues dimicando, defecit. This may seem a reasonable Cause of a Quarrel; but it not being certain that the Pygmies used to sow Corn, I will not insist on this neither.

Now what feems most likely to me, is the account that Pliny out of Megasthenes, and Strabo from Onesicritus give us; and, provided I be not obliged to believe or justifie all that they say, I could rest satisfied in great part of their Relation: For Pliny † tells us, Veris tempore universo agmine ad mare descendere, & Ova, Pullosque earum Alitum consumere: That in the Spring-time the whole drove of the ^{*} Pomp. Mela de situ Orbis, lib. 3. cap. 8.

[†] Plinij. Hist. Nat. lib. 7. cap. 2. p. m. 13.

Pygmies go down to the Sea fide, to devour the Cranes Eggs and their young Ones. likewife Oneficritus,* Πρός δέ τούς τρισπιθάμους πόλεμον είναι ταις Γεράνοις (ον καὶ "Ομηρον δηλοῦν) καὶ τοῖς Πέρδιξιν, οὖς χηνομεγέθεις εἶναι τούτους δ' έκλένειν αὐτῶν τὰ ώὰ, καὶ Φθείρειν ἐκεῖ γὰρ ἀοτοκείν τας Γεράνους διοπερ μηδαμού μηδ' ωὰ ευρίσκεσθαι Γεράνων, μητ' οὖν νεόττια i.e. That there is a fight between the Pygmies and the Cranes (as Homer relates) and the Partridges which are as big as Geefe; for these Pygmies gather up their Eggs, and destroy them; the Cranes laying their Eggs there; and neither their Eggs, nor their Nests, being to be found any where elfe. 'Tis plain therefore from them, that the Quarrel is not out of any Antipathy the Pygmies have to the Cranes, but out of love to their own Bellies. But the Cranes finding their Nests to be robb'd, and their young Ones prey'd on by these Invaders, no wonder that they should so sharply engage them; and the least they could do, was to fight to the utmost so mortal an Enemy. Hence, no doubt, many a bloody Battle happens, with various fuccess to the Combatants; fometimes with great flaughter of the long-necked Squadron; fometimes with great effusion of Pygmæan blood. And this may well enough, in a Poet's phancy, be magnified, and reprefented as a dreadful War; and no doubt of it, were one a Spectator of it, 'twould be diverting enough.

^{*} Strab. Geograph. lib. 15. pag. 489.

Si videas hoc

Gentibus in nostris, risu quatiere: sed illic, Quanquam eadem assiduè spectantur Prælia, ridet Nemo, ubi tota cohors pede non est altior uno.*

This Account therefore of these Campaigns renewed every year on this Provocation between the Cranes and the Pygmies, contains nothing but what a cautious Man may believe; and Homer's Simile in likening the great shouts of the Trojans to the Noise of the Cranes, and the Silence of the Greeks to that of the Pygmies, is very admirable and delightful. For Aristotle† tells us, That the Cranes, to avoid the hardships of the Winter, take a Flight out of Scythia to the Lakes about the Nile, where the Pygmies live, and where 'tis very likely the Cranes may lay their Eggs and breed, before they return. But these rude Pygmies making too bold with them, what could the Cranes do less for preferving their Off-spring than fight them; or at least by their mighty Noise, make a shew as if they would. This is but what we may observe in all other Birds. And thus far I think our Geranomachia or Pygmæomachia looks like a true Story; and there is nothing in Homer about it, but what is credible. He only expresses himself, as a Poet should do; and if Readers will mistake his meaning, 'tis not his fault.

^{*} Juvenal. Satyr. 13 vers. 170.

⁺ Aristotle. Hist. Animal. lib. 8. cap. 15. Edit. Scalig.

'Tis not therefore the Poet that is to be blamed, tho' they would father it all on him; but the fabulous Historians in after Ages, who have fo odly dreft up this Story by their fantastical Inventions, that there is no knowing the truth, till one hath pull'd off those Masks and Visages, wherewith they have disguised it.

For tho' I can believe Homer, that there is a fight between the Cranes and Pygmies, yet I think I am no ways obliged to imagine, that . when the Pygmies go to these Campaigns to fight the Cranes, that they ride upon Partridges, as Athenæas from Basilis an Indian Historian tells us; for, faith he,* Βάσιλις δὲ έν τω δευτέρω τῶν Ἰνδικῶν, οἱ μικροὶ, φησὶν, ἄνδρες οἱ ταῖς Γεράνοις διαπολεμοῦντες Πέρδιξιν ὀχήματι χρώνται· For prefently afterwards he tells us from Menecles, that the Pygmies not only fight the Cranes, but the Partridges too, Μενεκλης δέ έν πρώτη της συναγωγής οί πυγμαίοι, φήσι, τοις πέρδιξι, και ταις Γεράνοις πολέμουσι. This I could more readily agree to, because Onesicritus, as I have quoted him already confirms it; and gives us the fame reason for this as for fighting the Cranes, because they rob their Nests. But whether these Partridges are as big as Geefe, I leave as a Quære.

Megasthenes methinks in Pliny mounts the Pygmies for this expedition much better, for he fets them not on a Pegasus or Partridges, but on ^{*} Athenæi Deipnesoph. lib. p. 9. m. 390.

Rams and Goats: Fama est (faith Pliny*) insedentes Arietum Caprarumque dorsis, armatis fagittis, veris tempore universo agmine ad mare descendere. And Onesicritus in Strabo tells us, That a Crane has been often observed to fly from those parts with a brass Sword fixt in him, πλειστάκις δ' εκπίπτειν γέρανον χαλκήν έχουσαν ακίδα ἀπὸ τῶν εκείθεν πληγμάτων.† But whether the Pugmies do wear Swords, may be doubted. 'Tis true, Ctefias tells us, That the King of India every fifth year fends fifty Thousand Swords, besides abundance of other Weapons, to the Nation of the Cynocephali, (a fort of Monkeys, as I shall shew) that live in those Countreys, but higher up in the Mountains: But he makes no mention of any fuch Prefents to the poor Pugmies; tho' he affures us, that no less than three Thousand of these Pygmies are the Kings conftant Guards: But withal tells us, that they are excellent Archers, and fo perhaps by dispatching their Enemies at a distance, they may have no ^{*} Plinij. Nat. Hist. lib. 7. cap. 2. p. 13.

В

⁺ Strabo Geograph. lib. 15. p. 489.

[‡] Vide Photij. Biblioth.

need of fuch Weapons to lye dangling by their fides. I may therefore be miftaken in rendering ἀκίδα a Sword; it may be any other fharp pointed Inftrument or Weapon, and upon fecond Thoughts, shall suppose it a fort of Arrow these cunning Archers use in these Engagements.

These, and a hundred such ridiculous Fables, have the Historians invented of the Pygmies, that I can't but be of Strabo's mind,* 'Ράδιον δ' ἄν τις 'Ησιώδφ, καὶ 'Ομήρφ πιστέυσειεν ήρωολογοῦσι, καὶ τοῖς τραγικοῖς ποιηταῖς, ἡ Κτησία τε καὶ 'Ηροδότφ, καὶ 'Ελλανίκφ, καὶ ἄλλοις τοιούτοις· i.e. That one may sooner believe Hesiod, and Homer, and the Tragick Poets speaking of their Hero's, than Ctesias and Herodotus and Hellanicus and such like. So ill an Opinion had Strabo of the Indian Historians in general, that he censures them all as fabulous; † 'Απαντες μὲν τοίνυν οἱ περὶ τῆς Ἰνδικῆς γράψαντες ὡς ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ ψευδολόγοι γεγόνασι καθ' ὑπὲρβολὴν δὲ Δηΐμαχος· τὰ δὲ δεύτερα λεγει Μεγασθένης, 'Ονησικριτός τε καὶ Νέαρχος, καὶ ^{*} Strabo Geograph. lib. 11. p. m. 350.

⁺ Strabo ibid. lib. 2. p. m. 48.

ἄλλοι τοιοῦτοι i.e. All who have wrote of India for the most part, are fabulous, but in the highest degree Daimachus; then Megasthenes, Onesicritus, and Nearchus, and fuch like. And as if it had been their greatest Ambition to excel herein, Strabo* brings in Theopompus, as bragging, Τοτι καὶ μύθους ἐν ταῖς Ἱστορίαις ἐρεῖ κρεῖττον, ἤ ὡς Ἡρόδοτος, καὶ Κτησίας, καὶ Ἑλλάνικος, καὶ οἱ τὰ Ἱνδικὰ συγγράψαντες That he could foist in Fables into History, better than Herodotus and Ctesias and Hellanicus, and all that have wrote of India. The Satyrist therefore had reason to fay,

——Et quicquid Græcia mendax Audet in Historia.†

Aristotle,‡ 'tis true, tells us, "Ολως δὲ τὰ μὲν ἄγρια ἀγριώτερα ἐν τῆ 'Ασία, ἀνδρειότερα δὲ πὰντα τὰ ἐν τῆ Εὐρώπη, πολυμορφότατα δὲ τὰ ἐν τῆ λιβύη και λέγεται δε τις παροιμία, ὅτι ἀεὶ φέρει τὶ λιβύη καινόν' i.e. That generally the Beasts are wilder in Asia, ^{*} Strabo ibid. lib. I p. m. 29.

⁺ Juvenal. Satyr. X. verf. 174.

[‡] Aristotle Hist. Animal, lib. 8. cap. 28.

stronger in Europe, and of greater variety of shapes in Africa; for as the Proverb saith, Africa always produces something new. Pliny* indeed ascribes it to the Heat of the Climate, Animalium, Hominumque effigies monstriferas, circa extremitates ejus gigni, minimè mirum, artifici ad formanda Corpora, effigiesque cælandas mobilitate igneå. But Nature never formed a whole Species of Monsters; and 'tis not the heat of the Country, but the warm and fertile Imagination of these Historians, that has been more productive of them, than Africa it self; as will farther appear by what I shall produce out of them, and particularly from the Relation that Ctessas makes of the Pygmies.

I am the more willing to instance in Ctesias, because he tells his Story roundly; he no ways minces it; his Invention is strong and fruitful; and that you may not in the least mistrust him, he pawns his word, that all that he writes, is certainly true: And so successful he has been, how Romantick soever his Stories may appear, that they have been handed down to us by a great many other Authors, and of Note too; tho' fome at the fame time have looked upon them as mere Fables. So that for the prefent, till I am better informed, and I am not over curious in it. I shall make Ctefias, and the other Indian Historians, the Inventors of the extravagant Relations we at prefent have of the Pygmies, and not old Homer. He calls them, 'tis true, from fomething of Resemblance of their shape, andpes: But these Historians make them to speak the Indian Language; to use the same Laws; and to be fo confiderable a Nation, and fo valiant, as that the King of India makes choice of them for his Corps de Guards; which utterly spoils Homer's Simile, in making them fo little, as only to fight Cranes.

^{*} Plin. Nat. Hift. lib. 6. cap. 30. p. m. 741.

Ctefias's Account therefore of the Pygmies (as I find it in Photius's Bibliotheca,* and at the latter end of some Editions of Herodotus) is this:

^{*} Photij. Bibliothec. Cod. 72. p. m. 145.

"Ότι ἐν μέση τῆ Ἰνδικη άνθρωποι είσι μέλανες, καί καλούνται πυγμαίοι, τοίς άλλοις δμόγλωσσοι Ίνδοῖς. μικροί δὲ είσι λίαν οἱ μακρότατοι αὐτῶν πηχέων δύο, οί δε πλείστοι, ένδς ἡμίσεος πήχεως, κόμην δὲ ἔχουσι μακροτάτην, μέχρι και έπι τὰ γόνατα, καὶ ἔτι κατώτερον, και πώγωνα μέγιστον πάντων άνθοώπων έπειδάν οθν τόν πώγωνα μέγα φύσωσιν, οὐκέτι αμφιέννυνται οὐδὲν εμάτιον: άλλὰ τὰς τρίχας, τὰς μέν έκ της κεφαλής, δπισθεν καθιενται πολύ κάτω των γονάτων τὰς δὲ ἐκ τοῦ πώ γωνος, ξμπροσθεν μέχρι ποδών έλκομένας. "Επειτα περιπυκασάμενοι τὰς τρίχας περί άπαν το σώμα, ζώννυνται, χρώμενοι αὐταῖς ἀντὶ ίματίου, αίδοῖον δε μέγα έχουσιν, ώστε ψαύειν των σφυρών αὐτών, καὶ παχύ. αὐτοίτε σιμοί τε καὶ αἰσχροί. τὰ δὲ πρόβατα αὐτῶν, ώς άρνες. καὶ αὶ βόες καὶ οἰ δνοι, σχεδόν δσον κριοί: καὶ

Narrat præter ista, in media India homines reperiri nigros, qui Pygmæi appellentur. Eadem hos. qua Inda reliqui, lingua uti, sed valde esse parvos, ut maximi duorum cuhitorum, & plerique unius duntaxat cubiti cum dimidio altitudinem non excedant. Comam alere longissimam, ad ipfa ufque genua demifsam, atque etiam infra, cum barba longiore, quam, apud ullos hominum. Quæ quidem ubi illis promissior ese caperit, nulla deinceps vefte uti: sed catillos multò infra genua à tergo demissos, barbámque præter pectus ad pedes usque defluentem, per totum corpus in orbem con-Stipare & cingere, atque ita pilos ipsis suos vestimenti loco esse. Veretrum illis esse crassum ac longum, quod ad ipsos quoque pedum malleolos pertingat. Pygmeos hosce simis ese naribus, & deformes. Ipsorum item οί ζπποι αὐτῶν καὶ οἱ ἡμίονοι, καί τὰ ἄλλα πάντα ζωα. ούδεν μείζω κριών: Επονται δὲ τῷ βασιλεῖ τῶν Ἰνδῶν, τούτων των πυγμαίων άνδρες τρισχίλιοι, σφόδρα γάρ είσι τοξόται δικαιότατοι δέ είσι καὶ νόμοισι χρώνται ὤσπερ και οι Ίνδοί. Δαγωούς τε καὶ ἀλώπεκας θηρεύουσιν, οὐ τοῖς κυσίν, άλλὰ κόραξι καί λκτίσι καλ κορώναις καλ detois.

oves agnorum nostrorum instar esse: boves & asinos, arietum fere magnitudine, equos item multofque & cætera jumenta omnia nihilo esse nostris arietibus majora, Tria horum Pvomæorum millia Indorum regem in fuo comitatu habere, quod sagittarij sint peritissimi. Summos esse justitiæ cultores iisdémque quibus Indi reliqui, legibus parere. Venari quoque lepores vulpésque, non canibus, fed corvis, milvis, cornicibus, aquilis adhibitis.

'In the middle of India (faith Ctefias) there 'are black Men, they are call'd Pygmies, using 'the fame Language, as the other Indians; they 'are very little, the tallest of them being but 'two Cubits, and most of them but a Cubit and 'a half high. They have very long hair, reach-'ing down to their Knees and lower; and a 'Beard larger than any Man's. After their 'Beards are grown long, they wear no Cloaths, 'but the Hair of their Head falls behind a great 'deal

'deal below their Hams; and that of their Beards before comes down to their Feet: then 'laying their Hair thick all about their Body, 'they afterwards gird themselves, making use of 'their Hair for Cloaths. They have a Penis fo 'long, that it reaches to the Ancle, and the thick-'ness is proportionable. They are flat nosed and 'ill favoured. Their Sheep are like Lambs; and 'their Oxen and Asses scarce as big as Rams; 'and their Horses and Mules, and all their other 'Cattle not bigger. Three thousand Men of 'these Pygmies do attend the King of India. 'They are good Archers; they are very just, and 'use the same Laws as the Indians do. They 'kill Hares and Foxes, not with Dogs, but with 'Ravens, Kites, Crows, and Eagles.'

Well, if they are fo good Sports-men, as to kill Hares and Foxes with Ravens, Kites, Crows and Eagles, I can't fee how I can bring off Homer, for making them fight the Cranes themfelves. Why did they not fly their Eagles against them? these would make greater Slaughter and Execution, without hazarding themselves. The only excuse I have is, that Homer's Pygmies were real Apes like Men; but those of Ctesias were neither Men nor Pygmies; only a Creature begot in his own Brain, and to be found no where else.

Ctesias was Physician to Artaxerxes Mnemon as Diodorus Siculus * and Strabo † inform us. He was contemporary with Xenophon, a little later than Herodotus; and Helvicus in his Chronology places him three hundred eighty three years before Christ: He is an ancient Author, 'tis true, and it may be upon that score valued by some. We are beholden to him, not only for his Improvements on the Story of the Pygmies, but for his Remarks likewise on several other parts of Natural History; which for the most part are all of the same stamp, very wonderful and incredible; as his Mantichora, his Gryphins, the horrible Indian Worm, a Fountain of Liquid Gold, a Fountain of Honey, a Fountain whose Water will make a Man confess all that ever ^{*} Diodor. Siculi Bibliothec. lib. 2. p. m. 118.

⁺ Strabo Geograph. lib. 14. p. 451.

he did, a Root he calls πάρηβον, that will attract Lambs and Birds, as the Loadstone does filings of Steel; and a great many other Wonders he tells us: all of which are copied from him by Ælian, Pliny, Solinus, Mela, Philostratus, and others. And Photius concludes Ctefias's Account of India with this paffage: Ταῦτα γράφων καὶ μυθολογών Κτησίας. λέγει τ' άληθέστατα γράφειν' έπαγων ως τὰ μέν αὐτὸς ἰδων γράφει, τὰ δὲ παρ αὐτων μαθών τών είδότων, πολλά δέ τούτων καὶ άλλα θαυμασιώτερα παραλιπείν, διὰ τὸ μὴ δοξαι τοῖς μὴ ταῦτα θεασαμένοις ἄπιστα συγγράφειν i.e. These things -(faith he) Ctesias writes and feigns, but he himfelf fays all he has wrote is very true. Adding. that some things which he describes, he had seen himself; and the others he had learn'd from those that had feen them: That he had omitted a great many other things more wonderful, because he would not feem to those that have not feen them, to write incredibilities. But notwithstanding all this, Lucian* will not believe a word he faith; for he tells us that Ctesias has wrote of India, Α μήτε αυτός είδε, μήτε άλλου είποντος ήκουσεν, What he neither faw himself, nor ever heard from any Body else. And Aristotle tells us plainly, he is not fit to be believed: Ἐν δὲ τῆ Ἰνδικῆ ως φησι Κτησίας, οὐκ ὤν ἀξιόπιστος.* And the fame opinion A. Gellius + feems to have of him, as he had likewise of several other old Greek Historians which happened to fall into his hands at Brunduhum, in his return from Greece into Italy; he gives this Character of them and their performance: Erant autem isti omnes libri Græci, miraculorum fabularumque pleni: res inauditæ, incredulæ, Scriptores veteres non parvæ authoritatis, Aristeas Proconnesius, & Isagonus, & Nicæenfis, & Ctefias, & Oneficritus, & Polyftephanus, & Hegefias. Not that I think all that Ctesias has wrote is fabulous; For tho' I cannnot believe his speaking Pygmies, yet what he writes of the Bird he calls Birrakos, that it would speak Greek and the Indian Language, no doubt is very true; and as H. Stephenst observes in his Apology for Ctefias, fuch a Relation would ^{*} Arist. Hist. Animal. lib. 8. cap. 28.

^{*} Lucian lib 1. veræ Histor. p. m. 373.

[†] A. Gellij. Noctes. Attic. lib. 9. cap. 4.

[‡] Henr. Stephani de Ctesa Historico antiquissimo disquistio, ad finem Herodoti.

feem very furprifing to one, that had never feen nor heard of a Parrot.

But this Story of Ctesias's speaking Pygmies, feems to be confirm'd by the Account that Non-nosus, the Emperour Justinian's Ambassador into Æthiopia, gives of his Travels. I will transcribe the Passage, as I find it in Photius,* and 'tis as sollows:

"Ότι ἀπὸ της φαρσάν πλέοντι τω Νοννόσω, έπὶ την ἐσχάτην τῶν νήσων κατηντηκότι τοίον δέ τί συνέβη, θαθμα καὶ ἀκοθσαι. ένέτυχε γάρ τισι μορφην μέν καὶ ιδέαν έχουσιν άνθρωπίνην, βραχυτάτοις δὲ τὸ μέγεθος, καὶ μέλασι την χρόαν. ὑπὸ δὲ τριχῶν δεδασυσμένοις διά παντός τοῦ σώματος. ξιποντο δὲ τοῖς ανδράσι καὶ γυναῖκες παραπλήσιαι καί παιδάρια ἔτι βραχύτερα, των παβ αὐτοῖς ἀνδρών. γυμνοί δὲ πσαν

Naviganti à Pharsa Nonnoso, & ad extremam usque infularum delato, tale quid occurrit, vel ipfo auditu admirandum. Incidit enim in quosdam forma quidem & figura humana, fed brevissimos, & cutem nigros. totumque pilo sos corpus. Sequebantur viros æquales fæmina, & pueri adhuc breviores. Nudi omnes agunt, pelle tantum brevi adultiores verenda tecti, viri pariter ac fæminæ: agreste nihil, neque efferum quid præ se άπαντες πλην δέρματι τινί μικρώ την αίδω περιεκάλυοὶ προβεβηκότες πτον. όμοιως ἄνδρες τὲ καὶ γυναίκες. άγριον δὲ οὐδὲν ἐπεδ είκνυντο οὐδὲ ἀνήμερον άλλὰ και φωνην είχον μέν άνθρωπίνην, άγνωστον δὲ παντάπασι την διάλεκτον τοις τέ περιοίκοις άπασι, και πολλώ πλέον τοις περί την Νοννοσον, διέζων δὲ ἐκ θαλαττιων όστρείων, και ιχθύων, των άπὸ της θαλάσσης είς την νησον ἀποβριπτομένων θάρσος δè είχου οὐδέν, άλλά και δρώντες τούς καθ' ήμας άνθρώπους ύπέπτησαν, ώσπερ ήμεις τὰ μείσω τῶν θηρίων.

^{*} Photij. Bibliothec. cod. 3. p. m. 7.

ferentes. Quin & vox illis humana, sed omnibus, etiam accolis, prorsus ignota lingua, multoque amplius Nonnosi sociis. Vivunt marinis ostreis, & piscibus è mari ad insulam projectis. Audaces minimè sunt, ut nostris conspectis hominibus, quemadmodum nos visa ingenti fera, metu perculsi fuerint.

'That Nonnosus sailing from Pharsa, when he came to the farthermost of the Islands, a thing, very strange to be heard of, happened to him; for he lighted on some (Animals) in shape and appearance like Men, but little of stature, and of a black colour, and thick covered with hair all over their Bodies. The Women, who were of the same stature, sollowed the Men:

'They were all naked, only the Elder of them, both Men and Women, covered their Privy Parts with a small Skin. They seemed not at all fierce or wild; they had a Humane Voice, but their Dialect was altogether unknown to every Body that lived about them; much more to those that were with Nonnosus. They liv'd upon Sea Oysters, and Fish that were cast out of the Sea, upon the Island. They had no Courage; for seeing our Men, they were frighted, as we are at the sight of the greatest wild Beaft.

Φωνὴν εἶχον μὲν ἀνθρωπίνην I render here, they had a Humane Voice, not Speech: for had they spoke any Language, tho' their Dialect might be somewhat different, yet no doubt but some of the Neighbourhood would have understood something of it, and not have been such utter Strangers to it. Now 'twas observed of the Orang-Outang, that it's Voice was like the Humane, and it would make a Noise like a Child, but never was observed to speak, tho' it had the Organs of Speech exactly formed as they they are in Man; and no Account that ever has been given of this Animal do's pretend that ever it did. I should rather agree to what Pliny * mentions, Quibusdam pro Sermone nutus motulque Membrorum est; and that they had no more a Speech than Ctesias his Cynocephali which could only bark, as the fame Pliny + remarks; where he faith, In multis autem Montibus Genus Hominum Capitibus Caninis, ferarum pellibus velari, pro voce latratum edere, unguibus armatum venatu & Aucupio vesci, horum supra Centum viginti Millia fuisse prodente se Ctesias scribit. But in Photius I find, that Ctefias's Cynocephali did speak the Indian Language as well as the Pugmies. Those therefore in Nonnosus fince they did not speak the Indian, I doubt, fpoke no Language at all; or at least, no more than other Brutes do.

Ctefias I find is the only Author that ever understood what Language 'twas that the Pygmies spake: For Herodotus ‡ owns that they use a fort ^{*} Plinij Nat. Hist. lib. 6. cap. 30. p. m. 741.

[†] Plinij Nat. Hist. lib. 7. cap. 2. p. m. II.

[‡] Herodot. in Melpomene. pag. 283.

of Tongue like to no other, but screech like Bats. He saith, Oi Γαραμαντες οὖτοι τοὺς τρωγλοδύτας Αἰθιοπας θηρεύουσι τοῖσι τετρίπποισι. Οἱ γὰρ Τρωγλοδύται αἰθίοπες πόδας τάχιστοι ἀνθρώπων πάντων εἰσὶ, τῶν ἡμεῖς πέρι λόγους ἀποφερομένους ἀκούομεν. Σιτέονται δὲ οἱ Τρωγλοδύται ὄφις, καὶ Σαύρους, καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα τῶν Ἑρπετῶν. Γλῶσσαν δὲ οὐδεμιῆ ἄλλη παρομοίην νενομίκασι, ἀλλὰ τετρύγασι καθάπερ αἱ νυκτερίδες i.e. These Garamantes hunt the Troglodyte Æthiopians in Chariots with four Horses. The Troglodyte Æthiopians are the swiftest of foot of all Men that ever he heard of by any Report. The Troglodytes eat Serpents and Lizards, and such fort of Reptiles. They use a Language like to no other Tongue, but screech like Bats.

Now that the Pygmies are Troglodytes, or do live in Caves, is plain from Ariflotle,* who faith, Τρωγλοδύται δε' εἰσὶ τὸν βίον. And so Philostratus,† Τοὺς δὲ πυγμαίους οἰκεῖν μὲν ὑπογείους. And methinks Le Compte's Relation concerning the wild ^{*} Arist. Hist. Animal. lib. 8. cap. 15. p. m. 913.

[†] Philostrat. in vita Appollon. Tyanæi, lib. 3. cap. 14. p. m. 152.

or favage Man in Borneo, agrees fo well with this, that I shall transcribe it: for he tells us,* That in Borneo this wild or favage Man is indued with extraordinary strength; and not with standing he walks but upon two Legs, yet he is so swift of foot, that they have much ado to outrun him. People of Quality course him, as we do Stags here: and this fort of hunting is the King's usual divertisement. And Gassendus in the Life of Peiresky, tells us they commonly hunt them too in Angola in Africa, as I have already mentioned. So that very likely Herodotus's Troglodyte Æthiopians may be no other than our Orang-Outang or wild Man. And the rather, because I fancy their Language is much the fame: for an Ape will chatter, and make a noise like a Bat, as his Troglodytes did: And they undergo to this day the same Fate of being hunted, as formerly the Troglodytes used to be by the Garamantes.

Whether those ἄνδρας μικρούς μετρίων ελάσσονας ανδρών which the Nasamones met with (as Herodotus* relates) in their Travels to discover Libya, were the Pygmies; I will not determine: It feems that Nasamones neither understood their Language, nor they that of the Nasamones. However, they were fo kind to the Nasamones as to be their Guides along the Lakes, and afterwards brought them to a City, εν τη πάντας ειναι τοίσι ἄγουσι τὸ μέγεθος ἴσους, χρώμα δὲ μέλανας, i.e. in which all were of the same stature with the Guides, and black. Now fince they were all little black Men, and their Language could not be understood, I do suspect they may be a Colony of the Pygmies: And that they were no farther Guides to the Nasamones, than that being frighted at the fight of them, they ran home, and the Nasamones followed them.

^{*} Lewis le Compte Memoirs and Observations on China. p. m. 510.

I do not find therefore any good Authority, unless you will reckon Ctesias as such, that the Pygmies ever used a Language or Speech, any more than other Brutes of the same Species do among themselves, and that we know nothing of, whatever Democritus and Melampodes in ^{*} Herodotus in Euterpe seu lib. 2. p. m. 102.

Pliny,* or Apollonius Tyanæus in Porphyry† might formerly have done. Had the Pygmies ever fpoke any Language intelligible by Mankind, this might have furnished our Historians with notable Subjects for their Novels; and no doubt but we should have had plenty of them.

But Albertus Magnus, who was fo lucky as to guess that the Pygmies were a fort of Apes; that he should afterwards make these Apes to Speak, was very unfortunate, and spoiled all; and he do's it, methinks, so very awkwardly, that it is as difficult almost to understand his Language as his Apes; if the Reader has a mind to attempt it, he will find it in the Margin. ‡

^{*} Plinij Nat. Hift. lib. 10. cap. 49.

⁺ Porphyrius de Abstinentia, lib. 3. pag. m. 103.

[‡] Si qui Homines funt Silvestres, sicut Pygmeus, non fecundum unam rationem nobiscum dicti sunt Homines, sed aliquod habent Hominis in quadam deliberatione & Loquela, &c. A little after adds, Voces quædam (sc. Animalia) formant ad diversos conceptus quos habent, sicut Homo & Pygmæus; & quædam non faciunt hoc, sicut multitudo fere tota aliorum Animalium. Adhuc autem eorum quæ ex ratione cogitativa formant voces, quædam sunt succumbentia, quædam autem non succumbentia. Dico autem succumbentia, à conceptu Anima

Had Albertus only afferted, that the Pygmies were a fort of Apes, his Opinion possibly might have obtained with less difficulty, unless he could have produced some Body that had heard them talk. But Ulysses Aldrovandus* is so far from believing his Ape Pygmies ever spoke, that he utterly denies, that there were ever any such Creatures in being, as the Pygmies, at all; or that they ever sought the Cranes. Cum itaque Pygmæos (saith he) dari negemus, Grues etiam cum iis Bellum gerere, ut fabulantur, negabimus, tam pertinaciter id negabimus, ut ne jurantibus credemus.

I find a great many very Learned Men are of this Opinion: And in the first place, Strabo† is very positive; Έωρακὼς μὲν γὰρ οὐδεὶς ἐξηγεῖται τῶν πίστεως ἀξίων ἄνδρων i.e. No Man worthy of belief did ever fee them. And upon all cadentia & mota ad Naturæ Instinctum, sicut Pygmeus, qui non, sequitur rationem Loquelæ sed Naturæ Instinctum; Homo autem non succumbit sed sequitur rationem. Albert. Magn. de Animal. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. m. 3.

^{*} Ulys. Aldrovandi Ornitholog. lib. 20. p. m. 344.

⁺ Strabo Geograph. lib. 17. p. m. 565.

occasions he declares the same. So Julius Cæsar Scaliger * makes them to be only a Fiction of the Ancients, At hac omnia (faith he) Antiquorum figmenta & meræ Nugæ, si exstarent, reperirentur. At cum universus Orbis nunc nobis cognitus sit, nullibi hæc Naturæ Excrementa reperiri certissimum est. And Isaac Casaubon † ridicules fuch as pretend to justifie them: Sic nostra ætate (faith he) non desunt, qui eandem de Pygmæis lepidam fabellam renovent; ut qui etiam è Sacris Literis, si Deo placet, sidem illis conentur astruere. Legi etiam Bergei cujusdam Galli Scripta, qui se vidisse diceret. At non ego credulus illi, illi inquam Omnium Bipedum mendacissimo. I shall add one Authority more, and that is of Adrian Spigelius, who produces a Witness that had examined the very place, where the Pygmies were faid to be; yet upon a diligent enquiry, he could neither find them, nor hear any tidings of them. ‡ Spigelius therefore tells us, Hoc loco de Pygmæis dicendum erat, qui παρά πύγωνος dicti à statura, quæ ulnam non excedunt. Verùm ego Poetarum fabulas effe crediderim, pro quibus tamen Aristoteles minimè haberi vult, sed veram esse Historiam. 8. Hist. Animal. 12. affeverat. Ego quo minus hoc statuam, tum Authoritate primilm Doctissimi Strabonis 1. Geograph. coactus sum, tum potissimilm nunc moveor, quod nostro tempore, quo nulla Mundi pars eft, quam Nautarum Industria non perlustrarit, nihil tamen, unquam simile aut visum est, aut auditum. Accedit quod Franciscus Alvarez Lusitanus, qui ea ipsa loca peragravit, circa quæ Aristoteles Pygmæos esse scribit, nullibi tamen tam parvam Gentem à se conspectam tradidit. fed Populum effe Mediocris staturæ, & Æthiopes tradit.

^{*} Jul. Cas. Scaliger. Comment, in Arift. Hift. Animal. lib. 8. § 126. p. m. 914.

[†] Isaac Causabon Nota & Castigat. in lib. 1. Strabonis Geograph. p. m. 38.

[‡] Adrian. Spigelij de Corporis Humani fabrica, lib. 1. cap. 7. p. m. 15.

I think my felf therefore here obliged to make out, that there were fuch Creatures as Pygmies, before I determine what they were, fince the very being of them is called in question, and utterly denied by so great Men, and by others too that might be here produced. Now in the doing doing this, Aristotle's Affertion of them is so very positive, that I think there needs not a greater or better Proof; and it is fo remarkable a one, that I find the very Enemies to this Opinion at a lofs, how to shift it off. To lessen it's Authority they have interpolated the Text, by foifting into the Translation what is not in the Original; or by not translating at all the most material passage, that makes against them; or by miserably glossing it, to make him fpeak what he never intended: Such unfair dealings plainly argue, that at any rate they are willing to get rid of a Proof, that otherwise they can neither deny, or answer.

Aristotle's Text is this, which I shall give with Theodorus Gaza's Translation: for discoursing of the Migration of Birds, according to the Season of the Year, from one Country to another, he faith: *

Μετά μέν την φθινοπω- Fam ab Autumnali Æquiρινην 'Ισημερίαν, έκ τοῦ Πόν- noctio ex Ponto, Locifque του και των ψυχρων φεύγοντα frigidis fugiunt Hyemem τον 'επιόντα χειμώνα' μετά futuram. A Verno autem ^{*} Aristotel. Hist. Animal. lib. 8. cap. 12.

δέ την ξαρινην, έκ των θερινων, είς τούς τόπους τούς ψυχρούς, φοβούμενα τὰ καύματα τὰ μέν, καὶ ἐκ τῶν έγγυς τόπων ποιούμενα τάς μεταβολάς, τὰ δὲ, καὶ ἐκ τῶν έσχάτων ώς είπειν, οίον αί γέρανοι ποιοῦσι. Μεταβάλλουσι γάρ έκ των Σκυθικών είς τὰ ἔλη τὰ ἄνω τῆς Αἰγύπτου, δθεν ὁ Νείλος δεί. "Εστι δὲ ὁ τόπος οῦτος περί ον οι πυγμαίοι κατοικούσιν. οὐ γάρ έστι τοῦτο μῦθος, ἀλλ' ἔστι κατά την ἀλήθειαν. λέγεται, καὶ αὐτοὶ καὶ οἰ ίπποι Τρωγλοδύται δ' είσί τον βίον.

ex tepida Regione ad frigidam sese conferent, aftas metu futuri: & alia de locis vicinis discedunt, alia de ultimis, prope dixerim, ut Grues faciunt, quæ ex Scythicis Campis ad Paludes Ægypto superiores, unde Nilus profluit, veniunt, quo in loco pugnare cum Pygmæis dicuntur. Non enim id fabula est, sed certe, genus tum hominum, tum etiam Equorum pusillum (ut dicitur) est, deguntque in Γένος μικρόν μέν, ὤσπερ Cavernis, unde Nomen Troglodytæ à subeundis Cavernis accepere.

In English 'tis thus: 'At the Autumnal Æ-'quinox they go out of Pontus and the cold 'Countreys to avoid the Winter that is coming 'on. At the Vernal Æquinox they pass from 'hot Countreys into cold ones, for fear of the 'ensuing heat; some making their Migrations 'from nearer places; others from the most re-' mote (as I may fay) as the Cranes do: for they 'come

- 'come out of Scythia to the Lakes above Ægypt,
- 'whence the Nile do's flow. This is the place,
- 'whereabout the Pygmies dwell: For this is no
- ' Fable, but a Truth. Both they and the Horses,
- 'as 'tis faid, are a small kind. They are Troglo-
- 'dytes, or live in Caves.'

We may here observe how positive the Philofopher is, that there are Pygmies; he tells us where they dwell, and that 'tis no Fable, but a Truth. But Theodorus Gaza has been unjust in translating him, by foisting in, Quo in loco pugnare cum Pygmæis dicuntur, whereas there is nothing in the Text that warrants it: As likewife, where he expresses the little Stature of the Pygmies and the Horses, there Gaza has rendered it, Sed certè Genus tum Hominum, tum etiam Equorum pufillum. Aristotle only saith, révos μικρον μεν ωσπερ λέγεται, καὶ αὐτοὶ, καὶ οἱ ἵπποι. He neither makes his Pygmies Men, nor faith any thing of their fighting the Cranes; tho' here he had a fair occasion, discoursing of the Migration of the Cranes out of Scythia to the Lakes above Ægypt, where he tells us the Pygmies are.

Cardan

Cardan* therefore must certainly be out in his guess, that Aristotle only afferted the Pygmies out of Complement to his friend Homer; for surely then he would not have forgot their fight with the Cranes; upon which occasion only Homer mentions them.† I should rather think that Aristotle, being sensible of the many Fables that had been raised on this occasion, studiously avoided the mentioning this fight, that he might not give countenance to the Extravagant Relations that had been made of it.

But I wonder that neither Casaubon nor Duvall in their Editions of Aristotle's Works, should have taken notice of these Mistakes of Gaza, and corrected them. And Gesner, and Aldrovandus, and several other Learned Men, in quoting this place of Aristotle, do make use of this faulty Translation, which must necessarily lead them ^{*} Cardan de Rerum varietate, lib. 8. cap. 40. p. m. 153.

† Apparet ergo (faith Cardan) Pygmæorum Historiam esse fabulosam, quod & Strabo sentit & nostra ætas, cum omnia nunc sermè orbis mirabilia innotuerint, declarat. Sed quod tantum Philosophum decepit, suit Homeri Auctoritas non apud illum levis.

into Mistakes. Sam. Bochartus * tho' he gives Aristotle's Text in Greek, and adds a new Translation of it, he leaves out indeed the Cranes fighting with the Pygmies, yet makes them Men, which Aristotle do's not; and by anti-placing, ut aiunt, he renders Aristotle's Affertion more dubious; Neque enim (faith he in the Translation) id est fabula, sed reverâ, ut aiunt, Genus ibi parvum est tam Hominum quam Equorum. Julius Cæfar Scaliger in translating this Text of Ariflotle, omits both these Interpretations of Gaza; but on the other hand is no less to be blamed in not translating at all the most remarkable passage, and where the Philosopher feems to be so much in earnest; as, οὐ γὰρ ἔστι τοῦτο μῦθος, ἀλλ' ἔστι κατὰ τὴν ἀλήθειαν, this he leaves wholly out, without giving us his reason for it, if he had any: And Scaliger's + infinuation in his Comment, viz. Negat effe fabulam de his (sc. Pygmeis) Herodotus, at Philosophus semper moderatus & prudens etiam addidit, ωσπερ λέγεται, is not to ^{*} Bocharti Hierozoic. S. de Animalib. S. Script. part. Posterior. lib. I. cap. II. p. m. 76.

⁺ Scaliger. Comment. in Arift. Hift. Animal. lib. 8. p. m. 914.

be allowed. Nor can I affent to Sir Thomas Brown's * remark upon this place; Where indeed (faith he) Aristotle plays the Aristotle; that is, the wary and evading afferter; for tho' with non est fabula he feems at first to confirm it, yet at last he claps in, ficut aiunt, and shakes the belief he placed before upon it. And therefore Scaliger (faith he) hath not translated the first, perhaps Supposing it surreptitious, or unworthy so great an Affertor. But had Scaliger known it to be furreptitious, no doubt but he would have remarked it; and then there had been some Colour for the Gloss. But 'tis unworthy to be believed of Aristotle, who was so wary and cautious, that he fhould in fo fhort a passage, contradict himself: and after he had so positively affirmed the Truth of it, presently doubt it. His ωσπερ λέγεται therefore must have a Reference to what follows, Pufillum genus, ut aiunt, ipsi atque etiam Equi, as Scaliger himself translates it.

I do not here find Aristotle afferting or confirming any thing of the fabulous Narrations that had been made about the Pygmies. He does not fay that they were ἄνδρες, or ἄνθρωποι μικροί, or μέλανες; he only calls them πυγμαΐοι. And discoursing of the Pygmies in a place, where he is only treating about Brutes, 'tis reasonable to think, that he looked upon them only as fuch. This is the place where the Pygmies are; this is no fable, faith Aristotle, as 'tis that they are a Dwarfish Race of Men; that they speak the Indian Language; that they are excellent Archers; that they are very Just; and abundance of other Things that are fabulously reported of them; and because he thought them Fables, he does not take the least notice of them, but only faith, This is no Fable, but a Truth, that about the Lakes of Nile fuch Animals, as are called Pygmies, do live. And, as if he had foreseen, that the abundance of Fables that Ctefias (whom he faith is not to be believed) and the Indian Historians had invented about them, would make the whole Story to appear as a Figment, and render it doubtful, whether there were ever fuch Creatures as Pygmies in Nature; he more zealoufly afferts the Being of them, and affures us, That this is no Fable, but a Truth.

^{*} Sir Thomas Brown's Pseudodoxia, or, Enquiries into Vulgar Errors, lib. 4. cap. 11.

I shall therefore now enquire what fort of Creatures these Pygmies were; and hope so to manage the Matter, as in a great measure, to abate the Passion these Great Men have had against them: for, no doubt, what has incensed them the most, was, the sabulous Historians making them a part of Mankind, and then inventing a hundred ridiculous Stories about them, which they would impose upon the World as real Truths. If therefore they have Satisfaction given them in these two Points, I do not see, but that the Business may be accommodated very fairly; and that they may be allowed to be Pygmies, tho' we do not make them Men.

For I am not of Gefner's mind, Sed veterum nullus (faith he*) aliter de Pygmæis scripsit, quàm Homunciones esse. Had they been a Race of Men, no doubt but Aristotle would have informed himself farther about them. Such a Curiosity could not but have excited his Inquisitive Genius, to a stricter Enquiry and Examination; and we might easily have expected from him a larger Account of them. But finding them, it may be, a fort of Apes, he only tells us, that in fuch a place these Pygmies live.

^{*} Gesner. Histor. Quadruped. p. m. 885.

Herodotus* plainly makes them Brutes: For reckoning up the Animals of Libya, he tells us, Καί γὰρ οἱ ὄφιες οἱ ὑπερμεγὰθεες, καὶ οἱ λέοντες κατὰ τούτους είσὶ, καὶ οἱ ελέφαντές τε καὶ ἄρκτοι, καὶ ἀσπίδες τε καὶ ὄνοι οἱ τὰ κέρατα ἔχοντες καὶ οἱ κυνοκέφαλοι (ἀκέφαλοι) οἱ ἐν τοῖσι στήθεσι τοῦς ὀφθαλμοὺς ἔχοντες (ώς δή λέγεται γε ύπο λιβύων) καὶ ἄγριοι ἄνδρες, καὶ γυναίκες ἄγριαι καὶ ἄλλα πληθεϊ πολλά θηρία ἀκατάψευστα i.e. That there are here prodigious large Serpents, and Lions, and Elephants, and Bears, and Asps, and Asses that have horns, and Cynocephali, (in the Margin 'tis Acephali) that have Eyes in their Breaft, (as is reported by the Libyans) and wild Men, and wild Women, and a great many other wild Beasts that are not fabulous. 'Tis evident therefore that Herodotus his aypros ἄνδρες, καὶ γυναίκες ἄγριαι are only θηρία or wild Beasts: and tho' they are called ἄνδρες, they are no more Men than our Orang-Outang, or Homo [†] Herodot. Melpomene seu lib. 4. p. m. 285.

Sylvestris,

Sulvestris, or wild Man, which has exactly the fame Name, and I must confess I can't but think is the fame Animal: and that the fame Name has been continued down to us, from his Time, and it may be from Homer's.

So Philostratus speaking of Æthiopia and Ægypt, tells us,* Βόσκουσι δὲ καὶ θηρία οἶα οὐχ έτερωθι και ανθρώπους μελανας, δ μη άλλαι ήπειροι. Πυγμαίων τὲ ἐν αὐταῖς ἔθνη καὶ ὑλακτούντων ἄλλο ἄλλη. i.e. Here are bred wild Beasts that are not in other places; and black Men, which no other Country affords: and among st them is the Nation of the Pugmies, and the BARKERS, that is, the Cunocephali. For the Philostratus is pleased here only to call them Barkers, and to reckon them, as he does the Black Men and the Pygmies amongst the wild Beasts of those Countreys; yet Ctefias, from whom Philostratus has borrowed a great deal of his Natural History, stiles them Men, and makes them speak, and to perform most notable Feats in Merchandising. But not being in a merry Humour it may be now, before he was aware, he speaks Truth: For Cælius Rhodiginus's * Character of him is, Philostratus omnium qui unquam Historiam conscripserunt, mendacissimus.

^{*} Philostratus in vita Apollon, Tyanæi, lib. 6. cap. I. p. m. 258.

Since the Pygmies therefore are fome of the Brute Beafts that naturally breed in these Countries, and they are pleafed to let us know as much, I can easily excuse them a Name. "Ανδρες άγριοι, or Orang-Outang, is alike to me; and I am better pleased with Homer's ανδρες πυγμαίοι, than if he had called πίθηκοι. Had this been the only Instance where they had misapplied the Name of Man, methinks I could be fo good natur'd, as in fome measure to make an Apology for them. But finding them fo extravagantly loofe, fo wretchedly whimfical, in abusing the Dignity of Mankind, by giving the name of Man to fuch monstrous Productions of their idle Imaginations, as the Indian Historians have done, I do not wonder that wife Men have suspected all that comes out of their Mint, to be false and counterfeit.

^{*} Calij Rhodigini Lection. Antiq. lib. 17. cap. 13.

Such are their 'Αμύκτερες or "Αρρίνες, that want Nofes, and have only two holes above their Mouth; they eat all things, but they must be raw; they are short lived; the upper part of their Mouths is very prominent. The Ἐνοτοκείται, whose Ears reach down to their Heels, on which they lye and fleep. The "Aστομοι, that have no Mouths, a civil fort of People, that dwell about the Head of the Ganges; and live upon fmelling to boil'd Meats and the Odours of Fruits and Flowers; they can bear no ill fcent, and therefore can't live in a Camp. The Μονόμματοι or Μονόφθαλμοι, that have but one Eye, and that in the middle of their Foreheads: they have Dog's Ears; their Hair stands an end, but smooth on the Breafts. The Στερνόφθαλμοι, that have Eyes in their Breafts. The Πάναι σφηνοκέφαλοι with Heads like Wedges. The Μακροκέφαλοι, with great Heads. The ὑπὲρβορεοι, who live a Thoufand years. The ἀκύποδες, fo fwift that they will out-run a Horse. The ὀπισθοδάκτυλοι, that go with their Heels forward, and their Toes backwards. The Μακροσκελείς, The Στεγανόποδες, The Μονοσκελείς, who have one Leg, but will jump a great way, and are call'd Sciapodes, because when they lye on their Backs, with this Leg they can keep off the Sun from their Bodies.

Now Strabo,* from whom I have collected the Description of these Monstrous forts of Men, and they are mentioned too by Pliny, Solinus, Mela, Philostratus, and others; and Munster in his Cosmography + has given a figure of some of them; Strabo, I fay, who was an Enemy to all fuch fabulous Relations, no doubt was prejudiced likewise against the Pygmies, because these Historians had made them a Puny Race of Men, and invented fo many Romances about them. I can no ways therefore blame him for denying, that there were ever any fuch Men Pygmies; and do readily agree with him, that no Man ever faw them: and am fo far from diffenting from those Great Men, who have denied them on this account, that I think they have all the reason in the World on their fide. And to fhew how ready I am to close with them in this Point, I will here examine the contrary Opinion, and what Reasons they give for the supporting it: For there have been some Moderns, as well as the Ancients, that have maintained that these Pygmies were real Men. And this they pretend to prove, both from Humane Authority and Divine.

^{*} Strabo Geograph. lib. 15. p. m. 489. & lib. 2. p. 48. & alibi.

⁺ Munster Cosmograph. lib. 6. p. 1151.

Now by Men Pygmies we are by no means to understand Dwarfs. In all Countries, and in all Ages, there has been now and then observed such Miniture of Mankind, or under-fized Men. Cardan* tells us he saw one carried about in a Parrot's Cage, that was but a Cubit high. Nicephorus† tells us, that in Theodosius the Emperour's time, there was one in Ægypt that was no bigger than a Partridge; yet what was to be admired, he was very Prudent, had a sweet clear Voice, and a generous Mind; and lived Twenty Years. So likewise a King of Portugal sent to a Duke of Savoy, when he married his Daughter to him, an Æthiopian Dwarf but three Palms high.* And Thevenot † tells us of the Present made by the King of the Abyssins, to the Grand Seignior, of several little black Slaves out of Nubia, and the Countries near Æthiopia, which being made Eunuchs, were to guard the Ladies of the Seraglio. And a great many such like Relations there are. But these being only Dwarfs, they must not be esteemed the Pygmies we are enquiring about, which are represented as a Nation, and the whole Race of them to be of the like stature. Dari tamen integras Pumilionum Gentes, tam falsum est, quàm quod falsissimum, saith Harduin.

^{*} Cardan de subtilitate, lib. 11. p. 458.

⁺ Nicephor. Histor. Ecclesiast. lib. 12. cap. 37.

Neither likewise must it be granted, that tho' in some Climates there might be Men generally of less stature, than what are to be met with in other Countries, that they are presently Pygmies. Nature has not fixed the same standard to the growth of Mankind in all Places alike, no more than to Brutes or Plants. The Dimensions of ^{*} Happelius in Relat. curiosis, No. 85. p. 677.

⁺ Thevenot. Voyage de Levant. lib. 2. c. 68.

[‡] Jo. Harduini Notæ in Plinij Nat. Hift. lib. 6. cap. 22. p. 688.

them all, according to the Climate, may differ. If we consult the Original, viz. Homer that first mentioned the Pygmies, there are only these two Characteristics he gives of them. That they are Invymaso seu Cubitales; and that the Cranes did use to fight them. 'Tis true, as a Poet, he calls them ardress, which I have accounted for before. Now if there cannot be found such Men as are Cubitales, that the Cranes might probably fight with, notwithstanding all the Romances of the Indian Historians, I cannot think these Pygmies to be Men, but they must be some other Animals, or the whole must be a Fistion.

Having premifed this, we will now enquire into their Affertion that maintain the Pygmies to be a Race of Men. Now because there have been Giants formerly, that have so much exceeded the usual Stature of Man, that there must be likewise Pygmies as defective in the other extream from this Standard, I think is no conclusive Argument, tho' made use of by some. Old *Caspar Bartholine tells us, that because J.

^{*} Caspar. Bartholin. Opusculum de Pygmæis.

Cassanius and others had wrote de Gygantibus, fince no Body elfe had undertaken it, he would give us a Book de Pygmæis; and fince he makes it his defign to prove the Existence of Pygmies, and that the Pygmies were Men, I must confess I expected great Matters from him.

But I do not find he has informed us of any thing more of them, than what Jo. Talentonius, a Professor formerly at Parma, had told us before in his Variarum & Reconditarum Rerum Thefaurus,* from whom he has borrowed most of this Tract. He has made it a little more formal indeed, by dividing it into Chapters; of which I will give you the Titles; and as I fee occasion, fome Remarks thereon: They will not be many, because I have prevented my self already. The first Chapter is, De Homuncionibus & Pumilionibus seu Nanis à Pygmæis distinctis. The second Chapter, De Pygmæi nominibus & Etymologia. The third Chapter, Duplex effe Pygmæorum Genus; & primum Genus aliquando dari. He means Dwarfs, that are no Pygmies at all. The fourth Chapter is, Alterum Genus, nempe Gentem Pygmæorum effe, aut saltem aliquando fuisse Autoritatibus Humanis, fide tamen dignorum afferitur. 'Tis as I find it printed; and no doubt an Error in the printing. The Authorities he gives, are, Homer, Ctefias, Aristotle, Philostratus, Pliny, Juvenal, Oppian, Baptista Mantuan, St. Austin and his Scholiast. Ludovic. Vives, 70. Laurentius Anania, Joh. Caffanius, Joh. Talentonius, Gellius, Pomp. Mela, and Olaus Magnus. I have taken notice of most of them already, as I shall of St. Austin and Ludovicus Vives by and by. Jo. Laurentius Anania * ex Mercatorum relatione tradit (faith Bartholine) eos (fc. Pygmæos) in Septentrionali Thraciæ Parte reperiri, (quæ Scythiæ est proxima) atque ibi cum Gruibus pugnare. And Joh. Cassanius + (as he is here quoted) faith, De Pygmæis fabulofa quidem effe omnia, quæ de iis narrari solent, aliquando existimavi. Verilm cum videam non unum vel alterum, sed complures Classicos & probatos Autores de his ^{*} Joh. Laurent. Anania prope finem tractatus primi fua Geograph.

^{*} Jo. Talentonij Variar. & Recondit. Rerum. Thefaurus, lib. 3. cap. 21.

Homunculis

⁺ Joh. Cassanius libello de Gygantibus, p. 73.

Homunculis multa in eandem fere Sententiam tradidisse; eò adducor ut Pygmæos fuisse inficiari non aufim. He next brings in 70. Talentonius, to whom he is fo much beholden, and quotes his Opinion, which is full and home, Constare arbitror (faith Talentonius) * debere concedi, Pygmæos non solum olim fuisse, sed nunc etiam esse, & homines esse, nec parvitatem illis impedimento esse quo minus fint & homines fint. But were there fuch Men Pygmies now in being, no doubt but we must have heard of them; some or other of our Saylors, in their Voyages, would have lighted on them. Tho' Aristotle is here quoted, yet he does not make them Men: So neither does Anania: And I must own, tho' Talentonius be of this Opinion, yet he takes notice of the faulty Translation of this Text of Aristotle by Gaza: and tho' the parvity or lowness of Stature, be no Impediment, because we have frequently seen fuch Dwarf-Men, yet we did never fee a Nation of them: For then there would be no need of that Talmudical Precept which Job. Ludolphus * mentions, Nanus ne ducat Nanam, ne fortè oriatur ex iis Digitalis (in Bechor. fol. 45).

^{*} Jo. Talentonius Variar. & recondit. Rerum Thefaurus, lib. 3. cap. 21. p. m. 515.

I had almost forgotten Olaus Magnus, whom Bartholine mentions in the close of this Chapter, but lays no great stress upon his Authority, because he tells us, he is fabulous in a great many other Relations, and he writes but by hear-fay, that the Greenlanders fight the Cranes; Tandem (faith Bartholine) neque ideo Pygmæi funt, fi forte sagittis & hastis, sicut alij homines, Grues conficiunt & occidunt. This I think is great Partiality: For Ctefias, an Author whom upon all turns Rartholine makes use of as an Evidence, is very positive, that the Pygmies were excellent Archers: fo that he himself owns, that their being fuch, illustrates very much that Text in Ezekiel, on which he spends good part of the next Chapter, whose Title is, Pygmæorum Gens ex Exekiele, atque rationibus probabilibus adfiruitur; which we will confider by and by.

^{*} Job Ludolphi Comment. in Historiam Æthiopic. p. m. 71.

And tho' Olaus Magnus may write fome things by hear-fay, yet he cannot be fo fabulous as Ctesias, who (as Lucian tells us) writes what he neither faw himfelf, or heard from any Body elfe. Not that I think Olaus Magnus his Greenlanders were real Pygmies, no more than Ctefias his Pugmies were real Men; tho' he vouches very notably for them. And if all that have copied this Fable from Ctefias, must be look'd upon as the same Evidence with himself; the number of the Testimonies produced need not much concern us, fince they must all stand or fall with him.

The probable Reasons that Bartholine gives in the fifth Chapter, are taken from other Animals, as Sheep, Oxen, Horles, Dogs, the Indian Formica and Plants: For observing in the same Species fome excessive large, and others extreamly little, he infers, Quæ certè cum in Animalibus & Vegetabilibus fiant; cur in Humana specie non fit probabile, haud video: imprimis cum detur magnitudinis excessus Gigantæus; cur non etiam dabitur Defectus? Quia ergo dantur Gigantes, dabuntur & Pygmæi. Quam consequentiam ut firmam, firmam, admittit Cardanus,* licet de Pugmæis hoc tantilm concedat, qui pro miraculo, non pro Gente. Now Cardan, tho' he allows this Consequence, yet in the fame place he gives feveral Reasons why the Pygmies could not be Men, and looks upon the whole Story as fabulous. Bartholine concludes this Chapter thus: Ulteriùs ut Probabilitatem fulciamus, addendum Sceleton Pygmæi, quod Drefdæ vidimus inter alia plurima, servatum in Arce sereniss. Electoris Saxoniæ, altitudine infra Cubitum, Offium foliditate, proportioneque tum Capitis, tum aliorum; ut Embrionem, aut Artificiale quid Nemo rerum peritus suspicari possit. Addita insuper est Inscriptio Veri Pygmæi. I hereupon looked into Dr. Brown's Travels into those Parts, who has given us a large Catalogue of the Curiofities, the Elector of Saxony had at Dresden, but did not find amongst them this Sceleton; which, by the largeness of the Head. I suspect to be the Sceleton of an Orang-Outang, or our wild Man. But had he given us either a figure of it, or a more particular Description, it had been a far greater Satisfaction.

^{*} Cardan. de Rerum varietate, lib. 8. cap. 40.

The Title of Bartholine's fixth Chapter is. Pygmæos esse aut fuisse ex variis eorum adjunctis, accidentibus, &c. ab Authoribus descriptis oftenditur. As first, their Magnitude: which he mentions from Ctefias, Pliny, Gellius, and Juvenal; and tho' they do not all agree exactly, 'tis nothing. Autorum hic dissensus nullus est (faith Bartholine) etenim ficut in nostris hominibus, ita indubiè in Pygmæis non omnes ejusdem magnitudinis. 2. The Place and Country: As Ctesias (he faith) places them in the middle of India; Aristotle and Pliny at the Lakes above Ægypt; Homer's Scholiast in the middle of Ægypt; Pliny at another time faith they are at the Head of the Ganges, and fometimes at Gerania, which is in Thracia, which being near Scythia, confirms (he faith) Anania's Relation. Mela places them at the Arabian Gulf; and Paulus Jovius docet Pygmæos ultra Japonem esse; and adds, has Autorum dissensiones facile fuerit conciliare; nec mirum diversas relationes à Plinio auditas. For (faith he) as the Tartars often change their Seats, fince they do not live in Houses, but in Tents, so 'tis no wonder that the the Pygmies often change theirs, fince instead of Houses, they live in Caves or Huts, built of Mud, Feathers, and Egg-shells. And this mutation of their Habitations he thinks is very plain from Pliny, where speaking of Gerania, he faith, Pugmæorum Gens fuisse (non jam esse) proditur, creduntque à Gruibus fugatos. Which passage (faith Bartholine) had Adrian Spigelius confidered, he would not fo foon have left Aristotle's Opinion, because Franc. Alvares the Portuguese did not find them in the place where Aristotle left them; for the Cranes, it may be, had driven them thence. His third Article is, their Habitation, which Aristotle faith is in Caves; hence they are Troglodytes. Pliny tells us they build Huts with Mud, Feathers, and Egg-shells. But what Bartholine adds, Eò quod Terræ Cavernas inhabitent, non injurià dicti sunt olim Pygmæi, Terræ filii, is wholly new to me, and I have not met with it in any Author before: tho' he gives us here feveral other fignifications of the word Terræ filij from a great many Authors, which I will not trouble you at prefent with. 4. The Form, being flat nofed and ugly, as Ctefias. 5.

Their

Their Speech, which was the fame as the Indians, as Ctefias; and for this I find he has no other Author. 6. Their Hair; where he quotes Ctefias again, that they make use of it for Clothes. 7. Their Vertues and Arts; as that they use the fame Laws as the Indians, are very just, excellent Archers, and that the King of India has Three thousand of them in his Guards. All from Ctefias. 8. Their Animals, as in Ctefias; and here are mentioned their Sheep, Oxen, Asses, Mules, and Horses. 9. Their various Actions; as what Ctefias relates of their killing Hares and Foxes with Crows, Eagles, &c. and sighting the Cranes, as Homer, Pliny, Juvenal.

The feventh Chapter in Bartholine has a promising Title, An Pygmæi sint homines, and I expected here something more to our purpose; but I find he rather endeavours to answer the Reasons of those that would make them Apes, than to lay down any of his own to prove them Men. And Albertus Magnus's Opinion he thinks absurd, that makes them part Men part Beasts; they must be either one or the other, not a Medium between both; and to make out this, he gives us a large Quotation out of Cardan. But Cardan * in the fame place argues that they are not Men. As to Sueffanus † his Argument, that they want Reason, this he will not Grant; but if they use it less or more imperfectly than others (which yet, he faith, is not certain) by the fame parity of Reason Children, the Boeotians, Cumani and Naturals may not be reckoned Men; and he thinks, what he has mentioned in the preceding Chapter out of Ctefias, &c. shews that they have no small use of Reason. As to Suesfanus's next Argument, that they want Religion, Justice, &c. this, he faith, is not confirmed by any grave Writer; and if it was, yet it would not prove that they are not Men. For this defect (he faith) might hence happen, because they are forced to live in Caves for fear of the Cranes; and others besides them, are herein faulty. this Opinion, that the Pygmies were Apes and not Men, he quotes likewise Benedictus Varchius, ‡

^{*} Cardan. de Rerum varietate, lib. 8. cap. 40.

[†] Suessanus Comment. in Arist, de Histor, Animal. lib. 8. cap. 12.

[‡] Benedict. Varchius de Monstris. lingua vernacula.

and Joh. Tinnulus,* and Paulus Jovius,† and feveral others of the Moderns, he tells us, are of the same mind. Imprimis Geographici quos non puduit in Mappis Geographicis loco Pygmæorum simias cum Gruibus pugnantes ridicule dipinxisse.

The Title of Bartholine's eighth and last Chapter is, Argumenta eorum qui Pygmæorum Historiam fabulosam censent, recitantur & refutantur. Where he tells us, the only Person amongst the Ancients that thought the Story of the Pygmies to be fabulous was Strabo; but amongst the Moderns there are several, as Cardan, Budæus, Aldrovandus, Fullerus and others. The first Objection (he faith) is that of Spigelius and others; that fince the whole World is now discovered, how happens it, that these Pygmies are not to be met with? He has feven Answers to this Objection; how fatisfactory they are, the Reader may judge, if he pleases, by perusing them amongst the Quotations.‡ Cardan's second Objection (he faith) is, that they live but eight years, whence feveral Inconveniences would happen, as Cardan shews; he answers that no good Author afferts this; and if there was, yet what Cardan urges would not follow; and inflances out of Artemidorus in Pliny,* as a Parallel in the Calingæ a Nation in India, where the Women conceive when five years old, and do not live above eight. Gesner speaking of the Pygmies, saith, Vitæ autem longitudo anni arciter octo ut Albertus refert. Cardan perhaps had his Authority from Albertus, or it may be both took it from this paffage in Pliny, which I think would better agree to Apes than Men. But Artemidorus being an Indian Historian, and in the same place telling other Romances, the less Credit is to be inventi essent vivi à quolibet, pari jure Monocerota & alia negare liceret. 3. Qui maria pernavigant, vix oras paucas maritimas lustrant, adeo non terras omnes à mari dissitas, 4. Neque in Oris illos habitare maritimis ex Capite quinto manifestum est. 5. Quis testatum se omnem adhibuisse diligentiam in inquirendo eos ut inveniret. 6. Ita in terra habitant, ut in Antris vitam tolerare dicantur. 7. Si vel maximè omni ab omnibus diligentia quæsiti fuissent, nec inventi : fieri potest, ut instar Gigantum jam desierint nec fint amplius.

^{*} Joh. Tinnulus in Glotto-Chrysio.

⁺ Paulus Jovius lib. de Muscovit. Legatione.

[‡] Respondeo. 1. Contrarium testari Mercatorum Relationem apud Ananiam supra Cap. 4. 2. Et licet non jection

^{*} Plinij Hist. Nat. lib. 7. cap. 2. p. m. 14.

given to him. The third Objection, he faith, is of Cornelius à Lapide, who denies the Pugmies. because Homer was the first Author of them. The fourth Objection he faith is, because Authors differ about the Place where they should be: This, he tells us, he has answered already in the fifth Chapter. The fifth and last Objection he mentions is, that but few have feen them. He answers, there are a great many Wonders in Sacred and Profane History that we have not feen, yet must not deny. And he instances in three; As the Formica Indica, which are as big as great Dogs: The Cornu Plantabile in the Island Goa, which when cut off from the Beast. and flung upon the Ground, will take root like a Calbage: and the Scotland Geefe that grow upon Trees, for which he quotes a great many Authors, and fo concludes.

Now how far Bartholine in his Treatife has made out that the Pygmies of the Ancients were real Men, either from the Authorities he has quoted, or his Reasonings upon them, I submit to the Reader. I shall proceed now (as I promised) mifed) to confider the Proof they pretend from Holy Writ: For Bartholine and others infift upon that Text in Ezekiel (Cap. 27. Vers. 11.) where the Vulgar Translation has it thus; Filij Arvad cum Exercitu tuo supra Muros tuos per circuitum, & Pygmæi in Turribus tuis fuerunt; Scuta sua suspenderunt supra Muros tuos per circuitum. Now Talentonius and Bartholine think that what Ctesias relates of the Pygmies, as their being good Archers, very well illustrates this Text of Ezekiel: I shall here transcribe what Sir Thomas Brown * remarks upon it; and if any one requires further Satisfaction, they may consult fob Ludolphus's Comment on his Æthiopic History.†

The second Testimony (saith Sir Thomas Brown) is deduced from Holy Scripture; thus rendered in the Vulgar Translation, Sed & Pygmæi qui erant in turribus tuis, pharetras suas suspenderunt in muris tuis per gyrum: from whence notwithslanding we cannot inser this Assertion, for sirst the Translators accord not, and the Hebrew word ^{*} Sir Thomas Brown's Enquiries into Vulgar Errors, lib. 4. cap. 11. p. 242.

⁺ Comment. in Hist. Æthiopic. p. 73.

Gammadim is very variously rendered. Though Aquila, Vatablus and Lyra will have it Pygmæi, yet in the Septuagint, it is no more than Watchman; and so in the Arabick and High-Dutch. In the Chalde, Cappadocians, in Symmachus, Medes, and in the French, those of Gamed. Theodotian of old, and Tremillius of late, have retained the Textuary word; and so have the Italian, Low Dutch, and English Translators, that is, the Men of Arvad were upon thy Walls round about, and the Gammadims were in thy Towers.

Nor do Men only dissent in the Translation of the word, but in the Exposition of the Sense and Meaning thereof; for some by Gammadims understand a People of Syria, so called from the City of Gamala; some hereby understand the Cappadocians, many the Medes: and hereof Forerius hath a singular Exposition, conceiving the Watchmen of Tyre, might well be called Pygmies, the Towers of that City being so high, that unto Men below, they appeared in a Cubital Stature. Others expound it quite contrary to common Acception, ception, that is not Men of the least, but of the largest fize; so doth Cornelius construe Pygmæi, or Viri Cubitales, that is, not Men of a Cubit high, but of the largest Stature, whose height like that of Giants, is rather to be taken by the Cubit than the Foot; in which phrase we read the meafure of Goliah, whose height is said to be fix Cubits and a span. Of affinity hereto is also the Exposition of Jerom; not taking Pygmies for Dwarfs, but flout and valiant Champions; not taking the sense of πυγμή, which signifies the Cubit measure, but that which expresseth Pugils; that is, Men fit for Combat and the Exercise of the Fift. Thus there can be no fatisfying illation from this Text, the diversity, or rather contrariety of Expositions and Interpretations, distracting more than confirming the Truth of the Story.

But why Aldrovandus or Caspar Bartholine should bring in St. Austin as a Favourer of this Opinion of Men Pygmies, I see no Reason. To me he seems to affert quite the contrary: For proposing this Question, An ex propagine Adam vel filiorum Noe, quædam genera Hominum Monsfirosa strosa prodierunt? He mentions a great many monstrous Nations of Men, as they are described by the Indian Historians, and amongst the rest, the Pygmies, the Sciopodes, &c. And adds, Quid dicam de Cynocephalis, quorum Canina Capita atque ipse Latratus magis Bestias quam Homines confitentur? Sed omnia Genera Hominum, quæ dicuntur esse, esse credere, non est necesse. And afterwards fo fully expresses himself in favour of the Hypothesis I am here maintaining, that I think it a great Confirmation of it. Nam & Simias (faith he) & Cercopithecos, & Sphingas, h nesciremus non Homines esse, sed Bestias, possent isti Historici de sua Curiositate gloriantes velut Gentes Aliquas Hominum nobis impunitâ vanitate mentiri. At last he concludes and determines the Question thus, Aut illa, quæ talia de quibusdam Gentibus scripta sunt, omnino nulla sunt, aut fi funt, Homines non funt, aut ex Adam funt h Homines funt.

There is nothing therefore in St. Austin that justifies the being of Men Pygmies, or that the Pygmies were Men; he rather makes them Apes.

And there is nothing in his Scholiast Ludovicus Vives that tends this way, he only quotes from other Authors, what might illustrate the Text he is commenting upon, and no way afferts their being Men. I shall therefore next enquire into Bochartus's Opinion, who would have them to be the Nubæ or Nobæ. Hos Nubas Troglodyticos (faith * he) ad Avalitem Sinum effe Pugmæos Veterum multa probant. He gives us five Reafons to prove this. As, 1. The Authority of Hesychius, who saith, Νωβοι Πυγμαΐοι. 2. Because Homer places the Pygmies near the Ocean, where the Nubæ were. 3. Aristotle places them at the lakes of the Nile. Now by the Nile Bochartus tells us, we must understand the Astaborus, which the Ancients thought to be a Branch of the Nile, as he proves from Pliny, Solinus and Æthicus. And Ptolomy (he tells us) places the Nubæ hereabout. 4. Because Aristotle makes the Pygmies to be Troglodytes, and fo were the Nubæ. 5. He urges that Story of Nonnosus which I have already mentioned, and thinks that those that Nonnosus met with, were a Colony of the Nubæ; but afterwards adds, Quos tamen absit ut putemus Statura fuisse Cubitali, prout Poetæ fingunt, qui omnia in majus augent. But this methinks spoils them from being Pygmies; feveral other Nations at this rate may be Pygmies as well as these Nubæ. Besides, he does not inform us, that these Nubæ used to fight the Cranes; and if they do not, and were not Cubitales, they can't be Homer's Pygmies, which we are enquiring after. But the Notion of their being Men, had so possessed him, that it put him upon fancying they must be the Nubæ; but 'tis plain that those in Nonnosus could not be a Colony of the Nubæ; for then the Nubæ must have understood their Language, which the Text faith, none of the Neighbourhood did. And because the Nubæ are Troglodytes, that therefore they must be Pygmies, is no Argument at all. For Troglodytes here is used as an Adjective; and there is a fort of Sparrow which is called Passer Troglodytes. Not but that in Africa there was a Nation of Men called Troglodytes, but quite different from our Pygmies. How far Bochartus Bochartus may be in the right, in guesting the Lakes of the Nile (whereabout Aristotle places the Pygmies) to be the Fountains of the River Astaborus, which in his description, and likewise the Map, he places in the Country of the Avalitæ, near the Mossylon Emporium; I shall not enquire. This I am certain of, he misrepresents Aristotle where he tells us,* Quamvis in ea fabula hoc faltem verum effe afferat Philosophus, Pufillos Homines in iis locis degere: for as I have already observed; Aristotle in that Text saith nothing at all of their being Men: the contrary rather might be thence inferred, that they were Brutes. And Bochart's Translation, as well as Gaza's is faulty here, and by no means to be allowed, viz. Ut aiunt, genus ibi parvum est tam Hominum, quam Equorum; which had Bochartus confidered he would not have been fo fond it may be of his Nubæ. And if the Νωβοι ΙΙυγμαΐοι in Hefychius are fuch Pygmies as Bochartus makes his Nulæ, Quos tamen absit ut putemus statura fuisse Cubitali, it will not do our business at all; and neither ^{*} Bocharti Hierozoici pars Posterior, lib. 1. cap. 11. p. 76.

^{*} Sam. Bochart. Geograph. Sacra, Part. 1. lib. 2. cap. 23. p. m. 142.

Homer's Authority, nor Aristotle's does him any Service.

But this Fable of Men Pygmies has not only obtained amongst the Greeks and Indian Historians: the Arabians likewife tell much fuch Stories of them, as the same learned Bochartus informs us. I will give his Latin Translation of one of them, which he has printed in Arabick also: Arabes idem (faith * Bochartus) referunt ex cujusdam Græculi side, qui Jacobo Isaaci silio, Sigariensi fertur ita narrasse. Navigabam aliquando in mari Zingitano, & impulit me ventus in quandam Insulam. In cujus Oppidum cum devenissem, reperi Incolas Cubitalis esse staturæ, & plerosque Coclites. Quorum multitudo in me congregata me deduxit ad Regem suum. Justit is, ut Captivus detinerer; & inquandam Caveæ speciem conjectus sum; eos autem aliquando ad bellum instrui cum viderem, dixerunt Hostem imminere, & fore ut propediem ingrueret. multò post Gruum exercitus in eos insurrexit. Atque ideo erant Coclites, quod eorum oculos hæ confodiffent.

^{*} Bochartus ibid. p. m. 77.

confodissent. Atque Ego, virgà assumptà, in eas impetum feci, & illæ avolårunt atque aufugerunt; ob quod facinus in honore fui apud illos. This Author, it feems, reprefents them under the fame Misfortune with the Poet, who first mentioned them, as being blind, by having their Eyes peck'd out by their cruel Enemies. Such an Accident possibly might happen now and then, in these bloody Engagements, tho' I wonder the Indian Historians have not taken notice of However the Pygmies shewed themselves grateful to their Deliverer, in heaping Honours on him. One would guess, for their own fakes, they could not do less than make him their Generalistimo; but our Author is modest in not declaring what they were.

Ifaac Vossius seems to unsettle all, and endeavours utterly to ruine the whole Story: for he tells us, If you travel all over Africa, you shall not meet with either a Crane or Pygmie: Se mirari (saith * Isaac Vossius) Aristotelem, quod tam seriò affirmet non esse fabellam, quæ de Pygmæis & Bello, quod cum Gruibus gerant, narrantur. Si quis totam pervadat Africam, nullas vel Grues vel Pygmæos inveniet. Now one would wonder more at Vossius, that he should affert this of Aristotle, which he never faid. And fince Vollius is fo mistaken in what he relates of Aristotle; where he might so easily have been in the right, 'tis not improbable, but he may be out in the rest too: For who has travelled all Africa over, that could inform him? And why should he be so peremptory in the Negative, when he had fo positive an Affirmation of Aristotle to the contrary? or if he would not believe Aristotle's Authority, methinks he should Aristophanes's, who tells us, * Σπείρειν όταν μέν Γέρανος κρωίζων ές την λιβυήν μεταχωρή. 'Tis time to fow when the noify Cranes take their flight into Libya. Which Observation is likewife made by Hesiod, Theognis, Aratus, and others. And Maximus Tyrius (as I find him quoted in Bochartus) faith, Ai γερανοι έξ Αἰγύπτου ώρα θέρους αφιστάμεναι, οὐκ ανεχόμεναι τὸ θάλπος, τείνασαι πτέρυγας ὥσπερ ἱστία, φέρονται διὰ τοῦ ἄερος ἐνθὺ τῶν Σκυθῶν γῆς. i.e. Grues per æftatem ex Ægypto abfcedentes, quia Calorem pati non poffunt, alis velorum instar expansis, per aerem ad Scythicam plagam rectà feruntur. Which fully confirms that Migration of the Cranes that Aristotle mentions.

^{*} Isaac Vossius de Nili aliorumque fluminum Origine, Cap. 18.

^{*} Aristophanes in Nubibus.

But Vossius I find, tho' he will not allow the Cranes, yet upon second Thoughts did admit of Pygmies here: For this Story of the Pygmies and the Cranes having made so much noise, he thinks there may be something of truth in it; and then gives us his Conjecture, how that the Pygmies may be those Dwarfs, that are to be met with beyond the Fountains of the Nile; but that they do not fight Cranes but Elephants, and kill a great many of them, and drive a considerable Traffick for their teeth with the Jagi, who sell them to those of Congo and the Portuguese. I will give you Vossius's own words; Attamen (saith * he) ut solent fabellæ non de nihilo singi & aliquod plerunque continent veri, id ipsum quo-que hic factum esse existimo. Certum quippe est ultra Nili sontes multos reperiri Nanos, qui tamen non cum Gruibus, sed cum Elephantis perpetuum gerant bellum. Præcipuum quippe Eboris commercium in regno magni Macoki per istos transigitur Homunciones; habitant in Sylvis, & mira dexteritate Elephantos sagittis consiciunt. Carnibus vescuntur, Dentes verd Jagis divendunt, illi autem Congentibus & Lusitanis.

^{*} Isaac Vossius ibid.

Fob Ludolphus* in his Commentary on his Æthiopick History remarks, That there was never known a Nation all of Dwarfs. Nani quippe (faith Ludolphus) Naturæ quodam errore ex aliis justæ staturæ hominibus generantur. Qualis verð ea Gens sit, ex qua ista Naturæ Ludibria tantâ copiâ proveniant, Vossum docere oportebat, quia Pumiliones Pumiles alios non gignunt, sed plerunque steriles sunt, experientia teste; ut planè non opus habuerunt Doctores Talmudici Nanorum matrimonia prohibere, ne Digitales ex iis nascerentur. Ludolphus it may be is a little too ftrict with Vossius for calling them Nani; he may only mean a fort of Men in that Country of less Stature than ordinary. And Dapper in his History of Africa, from whom Vossius takes this Account, describes such in the Kingdom of Mokoko, he calls Mimos, and tells us that they kill Elephants. But I fee no reason why Vossius should take these Men for the Pygmies of the Ancients, or think that they gave any occasion or ground for the inventing this Fable, if there was no other reason, this was sufficient, because they were able to kill the Elephants. The Pygmies were scarce a Match for the Cranes: and for them to have encountered an Elephant, were as vain an Attempt, as the Pygmies were guilty of in Philostratus,* 'who to revenge the Death ' of Antœus, having found Hercules napping in ' Libya, mustered up all their Forces against him. 'One Phalanx (he tells us) affaulted his left 'hand; but against his right hand, that being 'the stronger, two Phalanges were appointed. 'The Archers and Slingers befieged his feet, 'admiring the hugeness of his Thighs:

^{*} Fob Ludolphus in Comment. in Historiam Æthiopicam, p. m. 71.

^{*} Philostratus. Icon. lib. 2. p. m. 817.

^{&#}x27;against

'against his Head, as the Arsenal, they raised 'Batteries, the King himfelf taking his Post there. 'They fet fire to his Hair, put Reaping-hooks in 'his Eyes; and that he might not breath, clapp'd 'Doors to his Mouth and Nostrils; but all the ' Execution that they could do, was only to awake 'him, which when done, deriding their folly, he 'gather'd them all up in his Lion's Skin, and 'carried them (Philostratus thinks) to Euristhenes.' This Antœus was as remarkable for his height, as the Pygmies were for their lowness of Stature: For Plutarch* tells us, that Q. Sterorius not being willing to truft Common Fame, when he came to Tingis (now Tangier) he caused Antæus's Sepulchre to be opened, and found his Corps full threefcore Cubits long. But Sterorius knew well enough how to impose upon the Credulity of the People, as is evident from the Story of his white Hind, which Plutarch likewise relates.

But to return to our Pygmies; tho' most of the great and learned Men would seem to decry ^{*} Plutarch. in vita Q. Sertorij.

this Story as a Fiction and mere Fable, yet there is fomething of Truth, they think, must have given the first rise to it, and that it was not wholly the product of Phancy, but had fome real foundation, tho' difguifed, according to the different Imagination and Genius of the Relator: 'Tis this that has incited them to give their feveral Conjectures about it. Job Ludolphus finding what has been offered at in Relation to the Pygmies, not to fatisfie, he thinks he can better account for this Story, by leaving out the Cranes, and placing in their flead, another fort of Bird he calls the Condor. I will give you his own words: Sed ad Pygmæos (faith * Ludolphus) revertamur; fabula de Geranomachia Pygmæorum seu pugna cum Gruibus etiam aliquid de vero trahere videtur, si pro Gruibus Condoras intelligas, Aves in interiore Africa maximas, ut fidem penè excedat; aiunt enim quod Ales ista vitulum Elephanti in Aerem extollere possit; ut infra docelimus. Cum his Pygmæos pugnare, ne pecora fua rapiant, incredibile non est. Error ex eo natus videtur, quod primus Relator, alio vocabulo destitutus, Grues pro Condoris nominârit, sicuti Plautus Picos pro Gryphibus, & Romani Boves lucas pro Elephantis dixere.

^{*} Job Ludolphus Comment. in Historiam suam Æthiopic. p. 73.

'Tis true, if what Juvenal only in ridicule mentions, was to be admitted as a thing really done, that the Cranes could fly away with a Pygmie, as our Kites can with a Chicken, there might be fome pretence for Ludovicus's Condor or Cunctor: For he mentions afterwards* out of P. Joh. dos Santos the Portuguese, that 'twas observed that one of these Condors once flew away with an Ape, Chain, Clog and all, about ten or twelve pounds weight, which he carried to a neighbouring Wood, and there devoured him. And Garcilasso de la Vega† relates that they will seize and fly away with a Child ten or twelve years old. But Juvenal; only mentions this in ridicule and merriment, where he saith, ^{*} Job Ludolphus ibid. pag. 164.

[†] Garcilasso de la Vega Royal Comment. of Peru.

[‡] Juvenal Satyr. 13 vers. 167.

Ad fubitas Thracum volucres, nubemque sonoram Pygmæos parvis currit Bellator in armis: Mox impar hosti, raptusque per aera curvis Unguibus à sævå fertur Grue.

Befides, were the Condors to be taken for the Cranes, it would utterly ipoil the Pygmæomachia; for where the Match is fo very unequal, 'tis impossible for the Pygmies to make the least shew of a fight. Ludolphus puts as great hardships on them, to fight these Condors, as Vossius did, in making them fight Elephants, but not with equal Success; for Vossius's Pygmies made great Slaughters of the Elephants; but Ludolphus his Cranes sweep away the Pygmies, as easily as an Owl would a Mouse, and eat them up into the bargain; now I never heard the Cranes were so cruel and barbarous to their Enemies, tho' there are some Nations in the World that are reported to do so.

Moreover, these Condor's I find are very rare to be met with; and when they are, they often appear single or but a few. Now Homer's, and the Cranes of the Ancients, are always repre-

fented

fented in Flocks. Thus Oppian * as I find him translated into Latin Verse:

Et velut Æthiopum veniunt, Nilique fluenta Turmatim Palamedis Aves, celfæque per altum Aera labentes fugiunt Athlanta nivofum, Pygmæos imbelle Genus, parvumque fatigant, Non perturbato procedunt ordine denfæ Inftructis volucres obscurant aëra Turmis.

To imagine these Grues a single Gigantick Bird, would much lessen the Beauty of Homer's Simile, and would not have served his turn; and there are none who have borrowed Homer's fancy, but have thought so. I will only farther instance in Baptista Mantuan:

Pygmæi breve vulgus, iners Plebecula, quando Convenere Grues longis in prælia rostris, Sublato clamore fremunt, dumque agmine magno Hostibus occurrit, tellus tremit Indica, clamant Littora, arenarum nimbis absconditur aër; Omnis & involvit Pulvis solemque, Polumque, Et Genus hoc Hominum naturâ imbelle, quietum, Mite, facit Mavors pugnax, immane Cruentum.

^{*} Oppian lib. 1. de Piscibus.

Having now confidered and examined the various Opinions of these learned Men concerning this Pygmæomachia; and reprefented the Reasons they give for maintaining their Coniectures; I shall beg leave to subjoyn my own: and if what at prefent I offer, may feem more probable, or account for this Story with more likelyhood, than what hath hitherto been advanced, I shall not think my time altogether miffpent: But if this will not do, I shall never trouble my head more about them, nor think my felf any ways concerned to write on this Argument again. And I had not done it now, but upon the occasion of Dissecting this Orang-Outang, or wild Man, which being a Native of Africa, and brought from Angola, tho' first taken higher up in the Country, as I was informed by the Relation given me; and observing fo great a Resemblance, both in the outward shape, and, what surprized me more, in the Structure likewise of the inward Parts, to a Man; this Thought was eafily fuggested to me, That very probably this Animal, or fome other fuch of the same Species, might give the first rise and occasion to the Stories of the Pygmies. What has been the πρῶτον ψἔνδος, and rendered this Story so difficult to be believed, I find hath been the Opinion that has generally obtained, that these Pygmies were really a Race of little Men. And tho' they are only Brutes, yet being at first call'd wild Men, no doubt from the Resemblance they bear to Men; there have not been wanting those especially amongst the Ancients, who have invented a hundred ridiculous Stories concerning them; and have attributed those things to them, were they to be believed in what they say, that necessarily conclude them real Men.

To fum up therefore what I have already discoursed, I think I have proved, that the Pygmies were not an Humane Species or Men. And tho' Homer, who first mentioned them, calls them ἄνδρες πυγμαίοι, yet we need not understand by this Expression any thing more than Apes: And tho' his Geranomachia hath been look'd upon by most only as a Poetical Fistion; yet by assigning what might be the true Cause of this Quarrel between the Cranes and Pygmies, and by divefting it of the many fabulous Relations that the Indian Historians, and others, have loaded it with, I have endeavoured to render it a true, at least a probable Story. I have instanced in Ctesias and the Indian Historians, as the Authors and Inventors of the many Fables we have had concerning them: Particularly, I have Examined those Relations, where Speech or Language is attributed to them; and shewn, that there is no reason to believe that they ever spake any Language at all. But these Indian Historians having related so many extravagant Romances of the Pygmies, as to render their whole History suspected, nay to be utterly denied, that there were ever any fuch Creatures as Pygmies in Nature, both by Strabo of old, and most of our learned men of late, I have endeavoured to affert the Truth of their being, from a Text in Aristotle; which being so positive in affirming their Existence, creates a difficulty, that can no ways be got over by fuch as are of the contrary Opinion. This Text I have vindicated from the false Interpretations and Glosses of several Great Men, who had their Minds so preposses and prejudiced with the Notion of Men Pygmies, that they often would quote it, and misapply it, tho' it contain'd nothing that any ways favoured their Opinion; but the contrary rather, that they were Brutes, and not Men.

And that the Pygmies were really Brutes, I think I have plainly proved out of Herodotus and Philostratus, who reckon them amongst the wild Beasts that breed in those Countries: For tho' by Herodotus they are call'd ἄνδρες ἄγριοι, and Philostratus calls them ἀνθρώπους μέλανας, yet both make them θηρία or wild Beasts. And I might here add what Pausanias* relates from Euphemus Car, who by contrary Winds was driven upon some Islands, where he tells us, ἐν δὲ ταὺταις οἰκεῖν ἄνδρας ἀγρίους, but when he comes to describe them, tells us that they had no Speech; that they had Tails on their Rumps; and were very lascivious toward the Women in the Ship. But of these more, when we come to discourse of Satyrs.

^{*} Pausanias in Atticis, p. m. 21.

And we may the less wonder to find that they call Brutes Men, fince 'twas common for thefe Historians to give the Title of Men, not only to Brutes, but they were grown fo wanton in their Inventions, as to describe several Nations of Monstrous Men, that had never any Being, but in their own Imagination, as I have inftanced in feveral. I therefore excuse Strabo, for denying the Pygmies, fince he could not but be convinced, they could not be fuch Men, as these Historians have described them. And the better to judge of the Reasons that some of the Moderns have given to prove the Being of Men Pygmies, I have laid down as Postulata's, that hereby we must not understand Dwarfs, nor yet a Nation of Men, tho' fomewhat of a leffer fize and stature than ordinary; but we must observe those two Characteristicks that Homer gives of them, that they are Cubitales and fight Cranes.

Having premifed this, I have taken into confideration Caspar Bartholine Senior his Opusculum de Pugmæis, and 70. Talentonius's Differtation about them: and upon examination do find, that neither the Humane Authorities, nor Divine that they alledge, do any ways prove, as they pretend, the Being of Men Pygmies. St. Austin, who is likewise quoted on their side, is so far from favouring this Opinion, that he doubts whether any fuch Creatures exist, and if they do, concludes them to be Apes or Monkeys; and censures those Indian Historians for imposing fuch Beafts upon us, as diffinct Races of Men. Fulius Cæsar Scaliger, and Isaac Casaubon, and Adrian Spigelius utterly deny the Being of Pugmies, and look upon them as a Figment only of the Ancients, because such little Men as they describe them to be, are no where to be met with in all the World. The Learned Bochartus tho' he esteems the Geranomachia to be a Fable, and flights it, yet thinks that what might give the occasion to the Story of the Pygmies, might be the Nubæ or Nobæ; as Isaac Vossius conjectures that it was those Dwarfs beyond the Fountains of the Nile, that Dapper calls the Mimos, and tells us, they kill Elephants for to make a Traffick with their Teeth. But Fob Ludolphus alters the Scene, and instead of Cranes, fubflitutes his Condors, who do not fight the Pygmies, but fly away with them, and then devour them.

Now all these Conjectures do no ways account for Homer's Pygmies and Cranes, they are too much forced and ftrain'd. Truth is always easie and plain. In our present Case therefore I think the Orang-Outang, or wild Man, may exactly fupply the place of the Pygmies, and without any violence or injury to the Story, fufficiently account for the whole History of the Pygmies, but what is most apparently fabulous; for what has been the greatest difficulty to be folved or fatisfied, was their being Men; for as Gesner remarks (as I have already quoted him) Sed veterum nullus aliter de Pygmæis scripfit, quam Homunciones effe. And the Moderns too, being byaffed and mifguided by this Notion, have either wholly denied them, or contented themselves in offering their Conjectures what might give the first rife to the inventing this Fable.

Fable. And tho' Albertus, as I find him frequently quoted, thought that the Pygmies might be only a fort of Apes, and he is placed in the Head of those that espoused this Opinion, yet he spoils all, by his way of reasoning, and by making them speak; which was more than he needed to do.

I cannot fee therefore any thing that will fo fairly folve this doubt, that will reconcile all, that will fo eafily and plainly make out this Story, as by making the Orang-Outang to be the Pygmie of the Ancients; for 'tis the fame Name that Antiquity gave them. For Herodotus's ardres arpio, what can they be elfe, than Homines Sylvestres, or wild Men? as they are now called. And Homer's ἄνδρες πυγμαίοι, are no more an Humane Kind, or Men, then Herodotus's ἄνδρες ἄγριοι, which he makes to be θηρία, or wild Beasts: And the ανδρες μικροί or μέλανες (as they are often called) were just the same. Because this fort of Apes had so great a resemblance to Men, more than other Apes or Monkeys; and they going naturally erect, and being being defigned by Nature to go fo, (as I have flewn in the Anatomy) the Ancients had a very plaufible ground for giving them this denomination of ἄνδρες or ἄνθρωποι, but commonly they added an Epithet; as ἄγριοι, μικροὶ, πυγμαῖοι, μέλανες, or some such like. Now the Ancient Greek and Indian Historians, tho' they might know these Pugmies to be only Apes like Men. and not to be real Men, yet being fo extremely addicted to Mythology, or making Fables, and finding this fo fit a Subject to engraft upon, and invent Stories about, they have not been wanting in furnishing us with a great many very Romantick ones on this occasion. And the Moderns being imposed upon by them, and misguided by the Name of ἄνδρες or ἄνθρωποι, as if thereby must be always understood an Humane Kind, or real Men, they have altogether mistaken the Truth of the Story, and have either wholly denied it, or rendered it as improbable by their own Conjectures.

This difficulty therefore of their being called Men, I think, may fairly enough be accounted for by what I have faid. But it may be objected that the Orang-Outang, or these wild or savage Men are not muyuaîoi, or Trispithami, that is, but two Foot and a quarter high, because by fome Relations that have been given, it appears they have been observed to be of a higher stature. and as tall as ordinary Men. Now tho' this may be allowed as to these wild Men that are bred in other places; and probably enough like wife, there are fuch in fome Parts of the Continent of Africa; yet 'tis fufficient to our business if there are any there, that will come within our Dimensions; for our Scene lies in Africa; where Strabo observes, that generally the Beafts are of a less fize than ordinary; and this he thinks might give rife to the Story of the Pygmies. For, faith he * Tà δὲ βοσκήματα αὐτοῖς ἐστι μικρά, πρόβατα καὶ αἴγες, καὶ κύνες μικροὶ, τραχείς δέ καὶ μάχιμοι (οἰκοῦντες μικροὶ ὄντες) τὰχα δὲ καὶ τοὺς πυγμαίους ἀπὸ τῆς τούτων μικροφυίας ἐπενόησαν, καὶ ἀνέπλασαν. i.e. That their Beasts are small, as their Sheep, Goats and Oxen, and their Dogs are small, but hairy and fierce: and it may be (faith he) from the μικροφυία or littleness of the stature of thefe Animals, they have invented and imposed on us the Pygmies. And then adds, That no body fit to be believed ever faw them: because he fancied, as a great many others have done, that these Pugmies must be real Men, and not a fort of Brutes. Now fince the other Brutes in this Country are generally of a lefs fize than in other Parts, why may not this fort of Ape, the Orang-Outang, or wild Man, be fo likewife. Aristotle speaking of the Pygmies, faith, yévos μικρον μέν και αὐτοι, και οι ίπποι That both they and the Horses there are but small. He does not fay their Horses, for they were never mounted upon Horses, but only upon Partridges, Goats and Rams. And as the Horses, and other Beasts are naturally less in Africa than in other Parts, fo likewife may the Orang-Outang be. This that I diffected, which was brought from Angola (as I have often mentioned) wanted fomething of the just stature of the Pygmies; but it was young, and I am therefore uncertain to what tallness it might grow, when at full Age: And neither Tulpius, nor Gassendus, nor any that I have hitherto met with, have adjusted the full stature of this Animal that is found in those parts from whence ours was brought: But 'tis most certain, that there are forts of Apes that are much less than the Pygmies are described to be. And, as other Brutes, so the Ape-kind, in different Climates, may be of different Dimensions; and because the other Brutes here are generally small, why may not they be so likewise. Or if the difference should be but little, I see no great reason in this case, why we should be over-nice, or scrupulous.

^{*} Strabo Geograph. lib. 17. p. m. 565.

As to our Ape Pygmies or Orang-Outang fighting the Cranes, this, I think, may be easily enough made out, by what I have already observed; for this wild Man I dissected was Carnivorous, and it may be Omnivorous, at least as much as Man is; for it would eat any thing that was brought to the Table. And if it was not their Hunger that drove them to it, their Wantonness, it may be, would make them apt enough to rob the Cranes Ness; and if they did so, no doubt but the Cranes would make noise enough about it, and endeavour what they could to beat them off, which a Poet might easily make a Fight: Tho' Homer only makes use of it as a Simile, in comparing the great Shouts of the Trojans to the Noise of the Cranes, and the Silence of the Greeks to that of the Pygmies when they are going to Engage, which is natural enough, and very just, and contains nothing, but what may easily be believed; tho' upon this account he is commonly exposed, and derided, as the Inventor of this Fable; and that there was nothing of Truth in it, but that 'twas wholly a Fiction of his own.

Those Pygmies that Paulus Jovius * describes, tho' they dwell at a great distance from Africa, and he calls them Men, yet are so like Apes, that I cannot think them any thing else. I will give you his own words: Ultra Lapones (saith he) in Regione inter Corum & Aquilonem perpetuâ oppressa Caligine Pygmæos reperiri, aliqui eximiæ sidei testes retulerunt; qui postquàm ad summum adoleverint, nostratis Pueri denum annorum Mensuram vix excedunt. Meticulosum genus hominum, & garritu Sermonem exprimens, adeo ut tam Simiæ propingui, quam Statura ac sensibus ab justæ Proceritatis homine remoti videantur. Now there is this Advantage in our Hypothesis, it will take in all the Pygmies, in any part of the World, or wherever they are to be met with, without supposing, as some have done, that 'twas the Cranes that forced them to quit their Quarters; and upon this account feveral Authors have described them in different places: For unless we suppose the Cranes so kind to them, as to waft them over, how came we to find them often in Islands? But this is more than can be reasonably expected from so great Enemies.

^{*} Paul. Jovij de Legatione Muschovitar. lib. p. m. 489.

I shall conclude by observing to you, that this having been the Common Error of the Age, in believing the Pygmies to be a fort of little Men, and it having been handed down from so great Antiquity, what might contribute farther to the confirming of this Mistake, might be, the Imposture of the Navigators, who sailing to these these Parts where these Apes are, they have embalmed their Bodies, and brought them home, and then made the People believe that they were the Men of those Countries from whence they came. This M. P. Venetus affures us to have been done; and 'tis not unlikely: For, faith he,* Abundat quoque Regio ipfa (fc. Bafman in Java majori) diversis Simiis magnis & parvis, hominibus fimillimis, hos capiunt Venatores & totos depilant, nist quòd in barba & in loco Secreto Pilos relinquent, & occisos speciebus Aromaticis condiunt, & postea desiccant, venduntque Negociatoribus, qui per diversas Orbis Partes Corpora illa deferentes, homines perfuadent Tales Homunciones in Maris Infulis reperiri. 70h. Fonfton + relates the fame thing, but without quoting the Author; and as he is very apt to do, commits a great mistake, in telling us, pro Homunculis marinis venditant.

I shall only add, That the Servile Offices that these Creatures are observed to perform, ^{*} M. Pauli Veneti de Regionibus Oriental. lib. 3. cap. 15. p. m. 390.

⁺ Jo. Jonston. Hist. Nat. de Quadruped. p. m. 139.

might formerly, as it does to this very day, impose upon Mankind to believe, that they were of the fame Species with themselves; but that only out of fullenness or cunning, they think they will not speak, for fear of being made Slaves. Philostratus* tells us, That the Indians make use of the Apes in gathering the Pepper; and for this Reason they do defend and preserve them from the Lions, who are very greedy of preying upon them: And altho' he calls them Apes, yet he speaks of them as Men, and as if they were the Husbandmen of the Pepper Trees, καὶ τὰ δένδρα αἱ πιπερίδες, ὧν γεωργοὶ πίθηκοι. And he calls them the People of Apes; οῦ λέγεται πιθήκων οἰκεῖν δημος ἐν μυχοῖς τοῦ ὄρους. Dapper † tells us, That the Indians take the Baris when young, and make them fo tame, that they will do almost the work of a Slave; for they commonly go erect as Men do. They will beat Rice in a Mortar, carry Water in a Pitcher, &c. And Gaffendus; in the Life of Pieresky, tells ^{*} Philostratus in vita Apollonij Tyanæi, lib. 3. cap. 1. p. m. 110, & 111.

⁺ Dapper Description de l'Afrique, p. m. 249.

[‡] Gassendus in vita Pierskij, lib. 5. p. m. 169.

us, That they will play upon a Pipe or Cittern, or the like Musick, they will sweep the House, turn the Spit, beat in a Mortar, and do other Offices in a Family. And Acosta, as I find him quoted by Garcilasso de la Vega* tells us of a Monkey he faw at the Governour's House at Cartagena. 'whom they fent often to the Tayern for Wine, 'with Money in one hand, and a Bottle in the 'other; and that when he came to the Tavern, 'he would not deliver his Money, until he had ' received his Wine. If the Boys met with him 'by the way, or made a houting or noise after 'him, he would fet down his Bottle, and throw 'Stones at them; and having cleared the way 'he would take up his Bottle, and hasten home, 'And tho' he loved Wine exceffively, yet he 'would not dare to touch it, unless his Master 'gave him License.' A great many Instances of this Nature might be given that are very furprifing. And in another place he tells us, That the Natives think that they can speak, but will not, for fear of being made to work. And ^{*} Garcilasso de la Vega Royal Commentaries of Peru, lib. 8. cap. 18. p. 1333.

Bontius* mentions that the Javans had the fame Opinion concerning the Orang-Outang, Loqui verò eos, easque Javani aiunt, sed non velle, ne ad labores cogerentur.

* Jac. Bontij Hist. Nat. & Med. lib. 5. cap. 32. p. m. 85.

[Note.—A few obvious errors in the quotations have been corrected, but for the most part they stand as in Tyson, who must, therefore, be held responsible for any inaccuracies which may exist.]

THE END

Printed by BALLANTYNE, HANSON & CO.

Edinburgh and London

DO NOT REMOVE SLIP FROM POCKET

